Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I now ask that the bill (S. 1128) for the relief of Frederick J. Ernst be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE AT KANSAS CITY.

Mr. SHIVELY obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Indiana yield for just a moment?

Mr. SHIVELY. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask unanimous consent on behalf of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14189) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City.

Mr. BRISTOW. The next bill on the calendar is just as important as a bridge bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, if the Senator from Kansas objects——

Mr. BRISTOW. Let us follow the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senate was going into executive session, and that is why I made the request.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would like for the Senator from Indiana to withhold his motion for an executive session until the bill for the relief of Oakley Randall is passed. It is only for $160, to pay for actual service in the Army.

Mr. SHIVELY. Very well.

OAKLEY RANDALL.

The bill (S. 1216) for the relief of Oakley Randall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Oakley Randall, of Worthington, Marion County, W. Va., $160, due him for services rendered as a volunteer soldier in the Fourteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry during the Civil War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for a moment? I have waited here all the afternoon——

Mr. SHIVELY. I have been on the point of making this motion for the last 30 minutes, but I have been yielding.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I request the consideration of a bill which carries no appropriation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I desire the consideration of the bill on the calendar after the one in which the Senator from Texas is interested.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that when we consider the calendar the next time we begin at this point.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That would require a call of the roll.

Mr. SHIVELY. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate take a recess until Monday morning next at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., Saturday, June 6, 1914) the Senate took a recess until Monday, June 8, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 6, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. N. H. Holmes, D. D., of Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Lord our God, hear our prayers we beseech Thee for our country's representatives, that wisdom and strength may be given them to perform their every duty to the approval of their conscience, their constituency, and, above all, to God, the Judge of all men.

Mercifully guard their loved ones, that no illness or death enter the gates of their home life, nor any harm come near their dwelling places, while they are absent one from another.

Grant, we humbly pray, that these leaders of a Nation may enjoy a growing acquaintance with the Man of Galilee to the exaltation of their views of life, duty, and death, and to sustain them in all their arduous toils, with the hope that when their workday is over a grateful country and a merciful God will pronounce upon each of them the plaudits, "Well done, good and faithful servant"; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SIMS, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of illness in family.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. By clerical mistake the bill (H. R. 14128) granting permission to Lieut. Col. John P. Finley to accept and wear a decoration presented by the Sultan of Turkey was referred to the House Calendar. It should have been referred to the Private Calendar. Without objection, the change will be made.

There was no objection.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference—or does the gentleman from Tennessee ask to agree to a conference?

Mr. PADGETT. I ask for a conference. I understand the Senate has named the conferees.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman let it go over.

Mr. PADGETT. All right. Will it be satisfactory to call it up Monday?

Mr. MANN. Likely; but I will not say.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill; and pending that, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] if we can agree upon time for general debate?

Mr. GILLETT. I think it would be better to wait and let general debate run on for to-day. It may be possible to complete it to-day, but I doubt it, in view of the applications I have.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it might be much preferable if we could fix the time—the number of hours it will consume.

Mr. GILLETT. I am advised on this side that they are not ready to fix the time. I have had applications for five hours to-day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should think that the House would have talked itself pretty well out in the last two or three days.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not suppose that Members on this side desire to discuss the matters that have been occupying our attention for the last few days.

Mr. MANN. The Members on this side observed the recent rule, and only discussed the matters under consideration.

Mr. GARNER. That has not been invariable on that side.

Mr. MANN. I think it has.

Mr. GARNER. Oh, no. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] made a political speech, and the gentleman from Ohio touched on that a little himself.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time be controlled one half by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. CULLOP. To ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article from the Terre Haute Tribune, of Terre Haute, Ind., of June 4, 1914, concerning the condition of the window-glass industry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] yield to his colleague, the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. RAINEY. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the matter indicated.

Mr. MANN. We could not hear what the matter indicated was.

Mr. CULLOP. It is an article from the Terre Haute Tribune, of Terre Haute, Ind., relative to the condition of the window-glass industries in that city, in which city some of the largest factories in the United States are located, especially the North Baltimore plant. This article shows them to be in a most prosperous condition, unable to fill their orders.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask to insert an editorial from the Iron Trade Review in regard to the tin-plate industry, showing the increase of importations in that industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is running. Does the gentleman couple his request with that of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. GARNER. Let us have each one of these requests put separately.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. The following is the article referred to:

"LOCAL GLASS PLANTS KEEPING FORCES BUSY—FULLY 2,000 MEN AT WORK AT THREE FACTORIES WITH SUMMER PROSPECTS UNUSUALLY GOOD.

"Prospects for the summer business at the glass factories in Terre Haute are better this year than in any previous year, according to the statements made at the three concerns Thursday. At the North Baltimore glass factory it was necessary to refuse several big orders recently, because the factory lacked the equipment to turn out the orders. The Turner and the Root glass factories both report that they are running full forces.

"'We are using about 900 men on full time at the present,' said A. L. Pfau, of the North Baltimore company. 'This is the twenty-seventh year for the plant, and we are turning out more goods now than ever before. We will keep our men working at capacity up until the first week in August. Business for next fall is coming in already, and we have several large contracts that will keep the men busy beginning with the first week in September. It will be necessary to enlarge two of the furnaces during the month of August, and this will increase the force to a hundred more men. We expect a record business next year.'

"RUNNING AT CAPACITY.

"At the Root glass factory the regular force is running at capacity. Between 600 and 700 men are employed regularly at the plant, and these men are kept busy supplying the orders on hand. According to a statement made by the manager of the plant, men will be used full time throughout the summer. The plant will draw its fires the first week in August and the work will open with a full force in September.

"'Although we are not working as many men as we would like to, we can't complain of the business,' said C. M. Turner, of the Turner glass factory. 'At the present we are working about 400 men. The explosion of a large glass tank last week made it necessary to lay off 100 men. Business is as well as could be expected. We intend to open next fall with a full force.'

"All fires at the glass plants will be drawn the first week in August and the plants will resume work the first week in September. At the North Baltimore plant the traveling men have been soliciting no orders since January 1, because the plant had all the orders it could take for the summer."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I expect to discuss the question of corn, and I would like very much to be permitted to discuss that question and that question alone during the time I shall address the committee. On this floor for quite a number of weeks the tariff bill has been the subject of attack from the Republican side of this House, and those attacks usually center about that clause in the Underwood tariff bill which puts corn on the free list. It has been frequently asserted on the Republican side of this House that corn in large quantities was on its way to the city of Chicago. I called attention to what I believed then to be a fact during the address delivered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND], that only one carload of corn was on its way to Chicago or would likely reach Chicago. And some gentlemen on the other side most violently combated this statement, and insisted that hundreds of thousands of bushels of corn had been purchased for May delivery in Chicago, where prices for corn are made in this country, and which is our great corn market.

Now, whenever hundreds of thousands of bushels of corn from the Argentine Republic reach Chicago, Ill., they will commence to carry coals to New Castle. Some days ago there appeared in a Chicago paper, under great scare headlines, the statement that Argentine corn was on its way to Chicago, and under the headlines there appeared this article:

The first shipment of Argentine corn to come to Chicago is on its way here from New York. The buyers are Loomis & Edwards, and the car contains 60,000 pounds. According to the junior partner of the above firm, the corn is coming here in the way of a trial as chicken feed.

When I made that statement on this floor, a distinguished Republican Member indulged in a ghost dance on that subject and denied the statement, insisting that a very large amount of corn, some hundreds of thousands of bushels, had been purchased for May delivery in Chicago. I took the matter up with the Secretary of Agriculture, and he, after investigating the matter, advised me that he could hear of only one carload of Argentine corn that had as yet reached Chicago, and this was well along in the month of May.

I took the matter up with the secretary of the board of trade in Chicago, and he wrote me a letter, to which I may have occasion to refer again soon, advising me that 500,000 bushels of Argentine corn had been purchased for May delivery in the city of Chicago.

Now, I knew no corn could reach Chicago. I watched the Chicago papers all through the month of May, and no corn reached Chicago—not a bushel—except this one carload that was shipped there for the purpose of experimenting with it to see whether chickens would eat it or not.

I was not satisfied with my examination of the daily papers of Chicago, and so I wired yesterday to the secretary of the board of trade in Chicago and asked him what had become of that corn intended for May delivery in the city of Chicago. He had previously in his letter told me that it was expected that that tremendous shipment of corn would be stopped at Montreal and would be shipped to New England points. He wired me in reply, advising me that the corn that was purchased for May delivery in Chicago had been all stopped on the Atlantic coast for sale in New England. In his prior letter to me he had advised me that corn was at that time being shipped from Chicago to New England, and therefore he considered it extremely unlikely that these 500,000 bushels would reach Chicago. It would not be good business judgment to pay the freight on it to Chicago and then ship it back to New England. In his telegram yesterday he advised me, as I stated, that these 500,000 bushels of corn were stopped at Atlantic ports for New England delivery.

A fleet of grain vessels was organized once in Chicago for the purpose of carrying grain from Chicago to Liverpool through the Welland Canal and the Laurentian Canals, all the way without breaking bulk. This fleet of vessels was organized by the late Charles Councilman. They drew less than 14 feet of water. They were less than 255 feet long, and therefore they could go out through the Welland Canal. They made only two or three trips, and the fleet of vessels was disorganized and the vessels were sold soon after Mr. Councilman started on this plan. I asked the secretary of the Chicago Board of Trade why this happened, and he told me—and, of course, the fact is apparent to everyone—he told me that these ships could get no return cargoes from Liverpool or other European ports to Chicago; that shipments of grain from Chicago to Liverpool were irregular, and you could not tell when a vessel ought to go, and therefore the business of Charles Councilman did not succeed, and after just two or three trips he was compelled to abandon it.

Now, for the same reason Argentine corn can never reach Chicago in vessels that can go through the canal, for the reason that return cargoes from Chicago to the Argentine Republic are simply out of the question. We shall never see the day in this country when Chicago has a trade with the Argentine Republic that will authorize the installation of a line of vessels.

I am aware of the fact, however, that a peculiar condition with reference to freight rates prevails to-day upon the high seas. Ocean freight rates are cheaper than they have been for years, and the whole carrying trade of the ocean highways of the world seems at the present time to be disorganized, and vessels are not making the same regular trips they have made heretofore. So I thought it might be possible that this particular corn was purchased in good faith; that the contracts were really made in Chicago for the shipment of this corn in vessels that could reach Chicago and go all the way there by water. The figures for importations of corn for the month of May are not yet available, and so yesterday I wired all the ports in the United States—all the collectors of customs at those ports—where Argentine corn is likely to enter. I wired the collector of customs at Mobile, the collector at New Orleans, the collector at Galveston, the collector at New York, and the collector at Philadelphia. I was advised by the department that corn was expected at no other ports than these. But in order to examine more thoroughly into the Chicago transactions I wired also Boston. I got the reply from the collector of the port at Boston that no Argentine corn had reached that port during the month of May. I got the reply from the collector at Philadelphia that no Argentine corn had reached that port in the month of May. Argentine corn reached New Orleans, Galveston, New York, and Mobile during the month of May. Four hundred and two thousand four hundred and one bushels reached New York in May.

Now, this was all the corn that was brought here during the month of May that could possibly be stopped on the Atlantic coast by these Chicago grain speculators to be shipped to New England. But the Corn Products Co. has been the most important buyer in this country. Their plant at which purchases of Argentine corn are made is located at Edgewater, N. Y. I wired the president of the Corn Products Co. at Edgewater, asking him to advise me how much corn he had received at his plant for manufacture during the month of May, and he advised me that he had received 120,000 bushels. Now, this left only 282,401 bushels that could be stopped by Chicago traders at any Atlantic coast port from which distribution points in New England could be reached. This amount has been just about the amount of Argentine corn purchased each month by New York traders for their customers in New York. Therefore I have reached the conclusion—and I think the evidence bears me out in the statement—that these corn transactions, apparently made of record on the Board of Trade of Chicago, were absolutely fraudulent. There was no intention ever to deliver 500,000 bushels or any number of bushels of Argentine corn in Chicago in May except the one carload of chicken-feed corn to which I have called attention. It was never delivered there. It was never deflected at Montreal. It was never stopped on the Atlantic coast. It was never even purchased in the Argentine Republic.

The corn that reached New York in May came on these five ships—the Byron, the Van Dyke, the Anselm, the Queen Helena, and the Siam. The Byron and the Van Dyke, as I find this morning by consulting the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, have regular lines. They belong to the Lamport & Holt Line. They carry mails, and they are too big to get to Chicago. It is not at all probable that ships which carry mail and have regular routes could be even sent as far as Montreal. These two ships have never been in that trade.

The Anselm belongs to a Spanish company, is 264 feet long, and usually runs on regular routes. It never goes even to Montreal. Sometimes, however, it becomes a tramp steamer.

The Queen Helena belongs to a British company, the Dunlap Steamship Co., and is 364 feet long.

There are in the world four ships named The Siam. I do not know which one of them went to New York in May with corn from the Argentine Republic; but the very smallest of them is 258 feet long at the water line, and could not get through the Welland Canal. The Welland Canal locks are 270 feet long, have a depth over the miter sills of 14 feet, a width of 45 feet, and a ship 255 feet long on the water line is the very largest ship that can possibly go through that canal, owing to the fact that the extreme length of a vessel above the water line would be more than 270 feet if the vessel was over 255 feet in length at the water line. The smallest one of these five ships arriving at the port of New York was at least 3 feet too long to go through the Welland Canal. The evidence is absolutely convincing that these trades were never made. They were simply registered there in Chicago for the purpose of keeping down the price of May corn, and that is all there was to the transaction. They may have been made a matter of record there for the purpose of giving Republicans in this House an opportunity to make some speeches or some references to the question, and several of these gentlemen—I will not mention their names, for I do not wish to make them appear any more absurd than they have made themselves appear by believing these stories—several gentlemen on that side became victims of this sort of a hoax. No Argentine corn has reached Chicago. None of it will reach Chicago. No trades of this kind were made. The evidence is absolutely convincing, and that disposes of that argument.

The secretary of the Chicago Board of Trade, in one of his letters to me, told me that a through water rate from Argentina to Chicago for this proposed shipment had been made of 12 cents a bushel, and that this contemplated the transfer at Montreal of the cargoes to vessels that could go through the canal and included the expense of transferring the grain, which he stated was to be 2 cents a bushel. Of course, such an arrangement as this would be possible. It might be possible to assemble a fleet of lake vessels at Montreal to receive from these larger vessels I have named their cargoes of grain, but such an arrangement as this would not be at all probable, and the fact that the greater number of these vessels had regular routes and carry mail and could not be expected under any circumstances to go to Montreal shows that Chicago traders, anxious to keep down the price of May corn, deceived the officials of the Chicago Board of Trade as to this transaction. I will undertake to say that an examination of the papers of these vessels will show that not one of them had Montreal as its destination. If any one of these vessels was destined for Montreal, how was it possible to stop it in the high seas and land it at ports from which New England points could be reached, unless, of course, the vessels were equipped with a wireless apparatus? It is hardly possible that all of them were. At any rate the evidence I have collected shows that these pretended contracts for May delivery of Argentine corn in Chicago were a trick, an attempt to perpetrate a hoax upon the public, which, judging from the price of May corn in Chicago, was so clumsy that it did not succeed. The freight cost of delivering a bushel of corn from the Argentine Republic to Chicago by any possible ordinary route—by water to New York, by rail to Chicago—is 22 cents; of course, absolutely prohibitive, now and always.

Now, I have brought here this afternoon some samples of corn. I have here a sample of the old crop of Argentine corn and a sample of the new crop, which has just commenced to come in—all yellow corn. Side by side with these in another box is a sample of the yellow dent variety of corn raised in the corn belt of the West. This is the first Argentine corn of any kind to reach the city of Washington. The only Argentine corn that has ever come here was consigned to me, and I received it at my office. I have in my possession letters written to the Galt Co. feed store here in Washington, the leading company here handling corn, to whom I am indebted for some of these samples, written by New York dealers in Argentine corn a few weeks ago. In this letter these dealers made a price in New York of 71 cents per bushel, and advised the Galt Feed Store Co. here that it would cost 10½ cents per hundred pounds to get the corn down here to Washington. Of course this was prohibitive. Larger ships can reach Washington than can reach the city of Chicago from the Atlantic. Washington is a great corn-consuming point, and not a single bushel of Argentine corn, except these small samples that I have obtained here, has reached this city. Argentine corn at the present time reaches our seaport cities.

This corn is not used without grinding or cooking for feeding purposes, not even in the Argentine Republic. Up in New England and in New York they raise a flint corn which very much resembles this. They are accustomed to that kind of corn up there, and they use it for feed to a certain extent when they can not get our western corn. If any gentleman who knows anything about feeding stock thinks this Argentine corn, of either the old or the new crop, would do to feed whole to stock in that section of the Middle West where we raise corn and where we engage in animal husbandry, I want him to try to bite some of it and see whether he can or not. This is the hardest flint corn raised anywhere in the world. It could not be fed successfully to our beef animals in the West or to our hogs without either cooking it or grinding it. A gentleman who has just come down here to the table and examined it suggests that it looks very much like popcorn.

In the Argentine Republic they have about 10,000,000 acres in corn at the present time. We have in the United States 107,000,000 acres in corn. On the western continent there are 130,000,000 acres of corn lands, and we have within our boundaries the enormous acreage to which I have just called attention. We have a monopoly of the corn-producing business of the world, absolutely unassailable. If the entire product of the Argentine Republic could reach our shores, all they can ever possibly have to export, we would not know it ever came here if it were not for the speeches gentlemen on that side of the House so frantically make. I have obtained from these ports the shipments for the month of May. In the month of April we only brought 94,000 bushels of Argentine corn to the United States. Argentine corn matures in the month of April, and the new crop, of which I have a sample here, is just beginning to come in. During the month of May we brought in a little over 1,000,000 bushels of Argentine corn, probably most of it belonging to this new crop. We have brought up altogether from the Argentine Republic since the 3d of October, when the tariff bill went into effect, a little over 9,000,000 bushels of Argentine corn, including these May shipments. Now, that is all.

We have one county in the State of Illinois, McLean County, where they raise every year nearly twice as much corn as has reached the United States from Argentina since the Underwood tariff bill became a law. In McLean County, Ill., they raise every year over 16,000,000 bushels of corn. We have five counties in Illinois where they raise every year more corn than has yet come into this country from the Argentine Republic. The product of each of these five counties is all the way from 12,000,000 bushels to 16,000,000 bushels of corn every year. We raise in the State of Illinois alone, or in the State of Iowa either, twice as much corn as they can ever hope to raise for export in any one year in the entire Argentine Republic.

We have in corn in Illinois, and in Iowa also, an area larger than the entire corn area of the Argentine Republic. Recently Mr. Lavenir, of the agricultural department of the Argentine Republic, wrote an exceedingly interesting treatise on Argentine corn possibilities. His article has been carefully analyzed by that great farm paper, Wallace's Farmer. I presume they got it from his article. I know of no other place where they could have obtained this information. According to the analysis of Mr. Lavenir's article, compared with the corn situation in our country, Wallace's Farmer finds that our corn land is better than Argentine corn land; that it contains more of the elements which go to make up corn land than does the Argentine land, and that the Argentine corn land is already wearing out; that it is not likely, on account of the sandy nature of the Argentine soil, on account of the fact that alfalfa grows there so readily, that there will be any great extension of the area of corn land in the Argentine Republic.

We have engaged in the business of producing corn in the United States——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Has the gentleman any information as to how much corn Illinois and Iowa produce annually?

Mr. RAINEY. About 400,000,000 bushels each.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman from Illinois will allow me, I want to suggest to the gentleman that in Indiana we produce more corn annually than is produced in the Argentine Republic.

Mr. RAINEY. And you do not claim to be a corn State, either. We have engaged in the business of agriculture in the United States, according to the last census of farmers, planters, and overseers, 5,281,557 persons, and of agricultural laborers 3,004,061—in all, 8,285,618, about one-twelfth of our population, are engaged in this industry. It is fair to presume that in the Argentine Republic about the same ratio prevails, although I have not been able to get any data on the subject. If that is true, then there are in the Argentine Republic about 600,000 persons engaged in producing corn. Six hundred thousand persons in the Argentine Republic competing with over 8,000,000 men trained to this industry in the United States, producing corn, and operating on only 10,000,000 acres as against our 107,000,000 acres—why, the situation is absurd.

They raise corn all over the world. There is not a nation of Europe that does not raise corn, and yet in all Europe they only raise 654,000,000 bushels of corn in a year. That is the best they can hope to do. In the United States our shortage alone last year was nearly 700,000,000 bushels. We raise over 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn within the boundaries of the United States. The shortage of corn alone in the United States last year was greater than the entire annual production of all Europe.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any statistics in regard to the amount of exports of corn this year by the United States?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; we export corn every year. The figures for corn exported in April, the latest I have, is 709,098 bushels.

Mr. CULLOP. Has the gentleman the amount up to the 1st of April?

Mr. RAINEY. I have not.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to state that the amount up to this time is something near 4,000,000 bushels, in round numbers.

Mr. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman. During April we sent to Canada 434,730 bushels of corn. Why did not Chicago traders buy Argentine corn for Canada? We shipped corn to Cuba in April, 223,508 bushels. If they had corn on the way from the Argentine Republic, why did they not stop it at Cuba?

Now, one-half the corn brought to this country goes to the Corn Products Co., at Edgewater, N. Y. I have here a series of letters which I received from the president of that company and from the export manager of that company. The Corn Products Co. have four plants, three in Illinois and one of them at Edgewater. The Edgewater plant was built for the purpose of manufacturing corn for export and for that purpose alone. That is the business in which they engage. On account of the scarcity of corn in the West—Illinois, where we had a drought—they have been temporarily supplying a small demand in the immediate neighborhood of their factory. They have been bringing in about half their supplies from the Argentine Republic. I have here a letter from the president of the Corn Products Co., dated June 4, day before yesterday, in which he advises me that if it had been impossible for him to have obtained Argentine corn this year that great plant would have closed, and we would have lost the tremendous export business from the Edgewater plant, amounting to 10,000,000 bushels every year. They employ there from 700 to 900 men. They could move their plant just as well to the other side. The business of manufacturing corn products is a highly competitive business. They could move the plant to England, and they could get there just as good ocean freight rates and, as he says, perhaps better freight rates from the Upper Plate River, from where this corn comes, than from the Upper Plate River to Edgewater, N. Y., where he can unload right at his factory. But he has been bringing the Argentine corn here, manufacturing it here, and shipping the product abroad. Now, 4,000,000 bushels is all the corn that has been brought to the United States since the bill went into effect that could possibly have come into competition with American farmers. And now let me analyze, if I can, what that situation is.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he gets to that?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. ADAIR. Prior to the taking effect of the Underwood tariff law had this Corn Products Co. been importing corn for this Edgewater plant from any other country?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; and manufacturing it under rebate, getting it practically free.

Mr. ADAIR. And some had come from the Argentine to this plant prior to the passage of this bill?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; some had come from the Argentine, and some from the Danube Provinces, and during the month of September, before this bill went into effect, we brought into this country over 500,000 bushels of corn, nearly all of it coming from the Argentine Republic.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. If I understand the gentleman correctly, his argument is to the effect that the importation of corn from the Argentine has not lowered the price to the American farmer of the corn that he has to sell?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; and I am going to discuss that now. It would lower the price, perhaps, if it furnished serious competition. That is the only way to lower the price of anything. Let me see what the competition has been. We have brought in at the outside 4,000,000 bushels that could in any way be considered in competition with the American farmer. We really have not brought in that much. We raise in this country in a year, and we are talking now about a year's yield, 800 bushels of corn for every bushel of corn that has come into the country from the Argentine Republic to go on the market here.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I understand the gentleman to take the position, though not definitely clear, that that corn which came in for export was not affected by any reduction of the tariff, because before the Underwood bill was passed it was introduced, by rebate, and exported without the payment of any tariff dues.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; without the payment of any tariff except 1 per cent, absolutely nominal, just enough to reimburse us for keeping books at New York, and this could have continued just the same. For every 75 cents' worth of corn the Argentine farmer brings to this country, we produce over $600 worth of corn. Is there any competition about that?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. If I remember correctly, last year we produced 2,445,000,000 bushels of corn.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; about that much.

Mr. GOOD. Of which we fed on our farms 80 per cent, leaving to be sold less than 500,000,000 bushels of corn. This year in Argentina, if I understand the statistics correctly——

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I would rather the gentleman would not put his statistics in my speech.

Mr. GOOD. I just want to ask my question. The gentleman is dealing with statistics, and in order to ask my question I must, also. If I remember correctly, the Agricultural Department claims that the export surplus of corn from Argentina in the crop they are now harvesting will amount from 240,000,000 to 250,000,000 bushels. Therefore I want to ask the gentleman if it will not make serious competition for a country to import into this country corn free of duty, to the amount of from 240,000,000 to 250,000,000 bushels as against the crop the American farmer has to sell here of less than 500,000,000 bushels?

Mr. RAINEY. We do not export the amount of corn the gentleman talks about.

Mr. GOOD. I am talking about the amount that we have for sale.

Mr. RAINEY. We use it ourselves on our farms.

Mr. GOOD. We use 80 per cent.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; the greater portion of what the farmer raises to sell is used also on farms.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about that. The Agricultural Department has contended all along——

Mr. RAINEY. The Corn Products Co. uses 2 per cent of the entire product of this country and the greater portion of what remains is consumed here. We exported 189,000,000 bushels of corn in 1897, and we did that when the price of corn in Chicago ranged from 21 to 31 cents a bushel. We did that when there was a protection of 15 cents a bushel on corn. From 1897 to 1909 we added in this country to our corn-producing area 25,000,000 acres of land. The figures are not available as to how much we have added since 1909, but it is safe to assume that from 1897, when we had this low-priced corn under a Republican tariff of 15 cents a bushel and exported this amount, we have added to the corn-producing area in this country 30,000,000 acres of land, three times as much land as there is in corn in the entire Argentine Republic. We have furnished the farmers, the growers of corn, those who grew corn in 1897, with three times as much competition as could have been furnished by the Argentine Republic if the Argentine Republic had been moved bodily and set down here as a part of our coast, and yet corn has been going up in this country ever since, and there is a shortage in the country to-day in the corn area. We have not as many acres in corn as we ought to have in order to supply our immense and our rapidly increasing population, and while from 1897 until the present time the price of corn has been going up, the amount that we have exported has been going down until last year we only exported 45,000,000 bushels.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] stated that the farmers would sell about 500,000,000 bushels of corn, being the excess of the amount they feed, and that Argentina would have about 240,000,000 or 250,000,000 bushels for export. What proportion of that corn for export in Argentina would come to this country in competition with the 500,000,000 bushels?

Mr. RAINEY. The Argentine Republic raised in 1913 a bumper crop of corn. They had never raised so much corn there as they raised then, and they exported to all the world in that year only 190,000,000 bushels of corn, which was much more than they had ever exported before. If they raise a bumper crop every year and bring every bushel that they have for export to the United States, it will not amount to half as much as we can raise in the State of Illinois.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he said that in 1897 we exported 189,000,000 bushels of corn, being at a time when there was a duty of 15 cents a bushel on corn. Now, my recollection is—I may be wrong—but my recollection is that during the latter part of 1897 there was no duty whatever upon corn; that we were then under the benign influence of the tariff, very much like the tariff we have now that puts nearly everything we raise in the Northwest on the free list. I think the Dingley law did not go into effect until the latter half of the year 1897, which the gentleman quotes.

Mr. RAINEY. I think the Dingley law went into effect in July of that year; it went into effect July 24, 1897.

Mr. SLOAN. That is the latter half of the year.

Mr. RAINEY. The crop commences to mature in December. In 1898, the very next year after the Dingley law went into effect, corn, spot, sold in Chicago from 26 to 38 cents a bushel, the lowest price being in January of 1898 and the highest price being in December. I might say with reference to the Wilson tariff, which was superseded July 24, 1897, by the Dingley tariff, that we put corn on the dutiable list in our Democratic Wilson bill. It was not free. The tariff on corn in the Wilson bill was 20 per cent ad valorem, which was a higher rate than the Payne bill fixed. The Payne bill retained this Dingley specific rate of 15 cents per bushel, which, reduced to its equivalent ad valorem under the Payne bill, was 16.73 per cent. Therefore, if corn was higher in price under the Payne bill than under the Wilson bill, it was not because this tariff protection was higher—the rate was lower.

Mr. SLOAN. And in that connection it increased from the time it went into effect and kept on increasing until 1912, when it was the maximum, and it has been falling ever since.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield? I am sure the gentleman did not intend to misrepresent the situation in his answer to the question of the gentleman from Missouri——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAUCH. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I am authorized to yield the gentleman from Illinois 15 minutes additional.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman has stated that in 1913 the export of the surplus of Argentina was 190,000,000 bushels and that is the largest crop Argentina produced. I will ask if it is not a fact that the estimated crop of 1914, both by Argentina and the Agricultural Department of the United States, is that the surplus for export from Argentina this year will amount to from two hundred and forty to two hundred and fifty million bushels?

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman I do not know about that, but I do know that all the previous estimates as to the amount of corn that can possibly be exported from the Argentine Republic this year have been completely upset by the continuous rains in the Argentine Republic. There they harvest the corn and put it in bags for shipment, 5 bushels each, and it has no protection at all and easily molds, and they have had rain for two or three weeks on the unprotected corn, and a great deal has been ruined.

Mr. GOOD. Another brief question, if the gentleman will permit. I will ask the gentleman if he has read Farmers' Bulletin 587 of the Department of Agriculture, in which the department sets forth a chemical analysis of the corn grown here and comparing it with the corn of Argentina, and states the fact that the corn grown in Argentina is just as valuable a food product as the corn grown in the United States?

Mr. RAINEY. The bulletin to which the gentleman has called attention reaches no such conclusion as that.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman allow me to publish in the RECORD——

Mr. RAINEY. Not in my speech.

Mr. GOOD (continuing). The chemical analysis of the Department of Agriculture showing that fact?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman can publish it in his speech if he wants to do so. I know what the chemical analysis is. It is that the food content compares favorably with our No. 2 corn. The president of the Corn Products Co. advises me that it contains less starch than our No. 2 corn, but it contains more oils, and for that reason is as valuable to them in their business in manufacturing it into sirup and glucose as our native corn. The Argentine corn is a good corn, so far as its food content is concerned, the elements which go to make up food, proteins, starches, and oils, and the lack of moisture, and it compares in those particulars favorably with our No. 2 corn, but not for stock-food purposes, and that is what we want to use corn for principally.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has my colleague investigated and can he tell us if any of this Argentine corn has reached the interior, for instance, of the State of Illinois?

Mr. RAINEY. I just went over that a while ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sorry I did not get in in time to hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. RAINEY. Some of it has reached Illinois, one carload of it, to be used for experimental purposes in feeding chickens; that is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman permit one other question? Does the gentleman know or can he enlighten us whether this corn which came to Illinois and other interior sections of the country was in the natural course of trade, or whether it was induced to come by some kind of conspiracy for political purposes and effect?

Mr. RAINEY. Well, I do not know about that. I know that this carload of corn that went to Chicago was brought there for the purpose I have stated, and the firm bringing it there so stated.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. When we produce in this country a surplus of corn, as we have in many years gone by, and have exported corn each year, regardless of how high the tariff has been, it has had no effect upon the price?

Mr. RAINEY. No. When we export corn we sell it on world markets, in competition with Argentine corn; and Argentine corn, when we export corn, is just as much of a factor in fixing a world price for corn, if none of it comes here, as it would be if a very large part of it came here.

Mr. ADAIR. Then, if we should not produce a sufficient amount of corn for our own consumption, if our production should drop off 25 per cent or even 50 per cent, would it not be to the advantage of the American farmer to be able to buy corn imported without the duty upon it to feed the stock on his own farm?

Mr. RAINEY. I will say to the gentleman I am a farmer myself. I live on my farm, and I have a practical system of animal husbandry, and I feed all the corn I can raise. Last summer in a large portion of the corn belt of central Illinois there was a drought, and farmers there now are buying corn in carload lots—in one of the greatest corn-producing sections in the world. I paid a few weeks ago 75 cents a bushel for a carload of corn.

It came from the State of Iowa. I tried to buy some more a little while ago, and I found it would cost me 82 cents a bushel.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. I noted the answer—and I thought I understood it correctly—to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] that the importation of corn into this country has not affected the price of corn?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] would not answer it that way, I am sure.

Mr. SLOAN. Is that the way the gentleman answers it?

Mr. RAINEY. That is the way I understand it. I just offered some explanation for that.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman answer this, then? There has come in free of duty since the passage of the Underwood tariff bill, in round numbers, 8,000,000 bushels of corn, nearly all from Argentina, and if it has not affected the price, what has been the advantage——

Mr. RAINEY. To be fair with the gentleman, over 9,000,000 bushels of corn have come in, including the May delivery.

Mr. SLOAN. What has been the particular advantage, if it has not affected the price, in the casting away of the million and a quarter dollars of revenue that would have come in if that corn had come in under the 15 per cent duty of the former tariff?

Mr. RAINEY. I will answer that——

Mr. BORCHERS. What was the amount of production in this country in 1913?

Mr. RAINEY. We produce annually a little over 3,000,000,000 bushels of corn, and we had a shortage of nearly 700,000,000 bushels in 1913.

I want to tell you how the importation of Argentine corn benefits the farmer and does not hurt him any. The only fellows who are hurt are the speculators in Chicago. Corn has been as high or higher than it is now—spot corn in Chicago—only seven times, or perhaps eight times, in the last 43 years. In 1874 corn in Chicago ranged in price from 49 cents to 86 cents, the lowest price being in January of that year and the highest price being in September. In other words, those Chicago corn speculators paid the farmer 49 cents for his corn and sold it for 86 cents. The farmer did not get the benefit of that. By September he has disposed of his corn. He could not hold it. He had either fed it out by September or sold it. In 1882 was the next time when spot corn in Chicago was as high or higher than it is now. In that year the highest price paid was 81¼ cents and the lowest price paid was 79¼ cents. Again, in 1892, spot corn sold in Chicago in May for $1 a bushel, and the lowest price in that year was in January, when it sold for 37½ cents. In other words, those Chicago speculators knew they were shucking out their crops in January throughout the corn belt, on every acre of it, and they paid the farmer 37½ cents for it, and in the following May, when the farmers did not have any corn, they sold it for $1 a bushel.

In 1902 spot corn in Chicago ranged from 43¾ cents to 88 cents. It sold for the lowest in December, when the farmer was shucking it and putting it on the market, and those Chicago fellows kept it until the following July and sold it for 88 cents, when the farmer did not have any, and if he ran short he had to buy it back on that basis. In 1908 spot corn in Chicago ranged in price from 56½ cents to 82 cents. It sold in September and May for 88 cents, and in February it sold for 56½ cents. It sold for the lowest price in February. In other words, when the farmer had it for sale they paid him 56½ cents, and when they wanted to sell it they sold it back to him or anybody else who wanted it for 82 cents.

In 1911 spot corn ranged in price from 45½ cents to 76 cents in Chicago. Those Chicago dealers paid the lowest price in January, February, and March, when the farmer was putting his corn on the market, and they held it until November and sold it back to him, if he wanted it, at 76 cents a bushel. In 1912 spot corn ranged in price, in Chicago, from 47½ cents to 83 cents, the lowest, of course, in December, when the farmer had it for sale; and if he wanted any of it back in August he paid 83 cents for it, and then paid the freight from Chicago back to his farm. In 1913 corn ranged in price from 46½ cents a bushel to 78¼ cents; of course lowest in January, when the farmer had it for sale, and the highest in August and September, when he wanted to buy it.

That is the situation. These are the only years, in the last 43 years, when corn has ever sold at prices it sells for now or higher than it sells for now on the Chicago market. These corn speculators in Chicago have made more out of the corn that the corn-belt farmer of Nebraska, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Iowa, and Missouri produced, although the farmer made the crop, working under the hot suns of summer, than the farmer himself made.

Now, the Argentine corn crop matures in April. It commences to come to this country in May. It will commence under this law to come in when the farmer has no corn, when he has fed it out, or sold it to those Chicago speculators, and the only profits free corn can affect are the profits of the speculators in corn, who make more out of a bushel of corn every year than the farmer can possibly make.

The figures that I have been quoting are from the last report of the Chicago Board of Trade.

Now, considerable has been said about the effect on the value of farming lands of the importations of corn from the Argentine Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much more time does the gentleman need?

Mr. RAINEY. About 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield just for a question before he leaves that branch of his argument, a branch in which I am very much interested?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes, sir; I will yield.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman place in the RECORD the exports of the various corn-producing countries of the world for the last five or six years? As I understand it, the exportation of corn or any grain is the principal price-fixing factor.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, if I find it necessary in following the thread of my argument, or if I find it important, I will be glad to do it; but the gentleman can get as much time as I can, and if he thinks it advisable he can make that statement himself.

I want to print some extracts from local papers out in the corn belt in Illinois—I think nearly all of them are in my district—as to the price of corn lands at a time when these Chicago speculators and these Republican orators on that side have been trying to frighten farmers. Here is an extract from the Democrat Message, published at Mount Sterling, Ill., of March 28, 1914:

At a conservator's sale of land held in Hancock County recently $250 per acre was bid for 105 acres of land, but the court refused to approve the sale, claiming that the land did not sell for its full value.

Here is one from the Franklin (Ill.) Times of February 5, 1914:

HIGH LAND PRICES.

One hundred and sixty acres of land near Homer sold for $200 an acre last week and 76 acres near there changed hands at $230 an acre. The Byron E. Burke farm of 200 acres, 3 miles east of Bloomington, was sold to a neighboring farmer a few days since for $300 an acre.

These are all corn lands, every acre of them. Some of them I know myself. Now I read from the Jacksonville (Ill.) Courier of March 14, 1914:

MORGAN COUNTY FARM LAND BRINGS HIGH PRICE.

Morgan County land is still valuable, as was indicated in a public sale at 2 o'clock Saturday afternoon at the courthouse. The sale was in the case of Mary J. Ratliff against James F. Brown et al., and the land was a tract of 90 acres lying 1 mile north of the village of Concord. Mrs. Ratliff, the plaintiff in the suit, was the purchaser, and the sum paid was $229.50 per acre, or a total of $20,655.

From the Independent Press, Greggsville, Ill., of February 25, 1914, I read:

At a recent sale of the lands belonging to the late John Harris, of Bushnell, Hon. J. E. Harris, of that city, one of the heirs, purchased 1,017 acres, paying $163,649.96, or $160 per acre.

Chicago Daily Farmers & Drovers' Journal of March 2, 1914:

INCREASED LAND VALUES MAKE PASTURES SCARCE.

The increasing value of farming lands in central Kansas has almost put pasture land off the market entirely, and prairie lands are being put under the plow more and more. During the past year, 9,000 acres of prairie land was "broke" in Saline County, according to the reports of the various township assessors, which have just been made.

The land values are on an average $1.05 an acre higher than last year.

There is a shortage of cattle in this country at the present time, and the farmers of the West are just adopting a new system of animal husbandry in order to meet that shortage. Our pastures are being broken up and placed under cultivation. We are feeding now nearly 100,000,000 people, with less beef animals in the country than we had when we had less than 70,000,000 people. Recently the Department of Agriculture estimated that our beef shortage in this country was 18,000,000 head.

Now, this beef that is coming in from the Argentine Republic is simply fed on alfalfa. I have examined the statistics from the Argentine Republic as to the cattle industry there for the latest year for which statistics are available—the year 1908, I think—and, according to the statistics, they had there then in Argentina as many animals, counting dairy cows and everything else, as the shortage amounts to in this country. In other words, if they should bring to the United States every acre of land in the Argentine Republic that is in corn and annex it to this Republic, it would not supply the shortage in the area necessary for producing corn sufficient to support the population that we now have, and if they brought every ox and cow and steer in the Argentine Republic that was a beef animal, and if every one of them was brought in a body to the United States and turned loose here, they would not supply the cattle shortage in this country.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman think the importation of this amount of chilled and frozen meats from Argentina has reduced the price that the American farmer and stock raiser gets for his product?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not think so.

Mr. GOOD. Then, if the reduction of the duty on corn and on oats and on wheat and on meat did not reduce the price, your tariff is a failure, so far as reducing the cost of living is concerned, is it not?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, the tariff does reduce the cost of living, and it will reduce it more and more as time passes. These foodstuffs reach our congested coast cities, where they ought to have something to eat cheaper than they now get it. The Argentine beef can not compete with our beef any more than the broken-down dray horses they kill in Kansas City and manufacture into wienerwurst can compete with our corn-fed beeves. The Argentine beeves are grass-fed cattle. What the farmer engaged in animal husbandry in our country needs—and they will all be engaged in that soon—is exactly what we have given him in this tariff bill—free live cattle. He gets bigger prices now than he ever got before for his finished beeves, but he pays higher prices for the material out of which he makes them than he ever paid before.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman deny that the Argentine alfalfa-fed cattle of recent stock is not just as good meat as the corn-fed cattle?

Mr. RAINEY. Does the gentleman from Illinois—from that great cattle-feeding State—think so?

Mr. MANN. I assert it on the strength of information furnished to me by men engaged in the business in Chicago.

Mr. RAINEY. I advise the gentleman to get his information from a more reliable source, and then he will not ask these questions.

Mr. MANN. I get it from the most reliable source in the world, from such institutions as Armour's, Swift's, and——

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; you get it from the people who are interested in paying just as little to the American farmer as possible, and who do pay him as little as they can.

Mr. MANN. From the men who are interested in sending their meat to this country and other countries, and who find that it is just as salable and just as edible and just as tasteful as the corn-fed cattle.

Mr. RAINEY. Well, the gentleman ought to go and talk to somebody who eats it, and try some of it himself. [Laughter.] He will find that the kind of information you get from men who eat it is different.

Mr. MANN. I have eaten some of it, I will say to the gentleman; and I will add that I am a fairly good expert on meat.

Mr. RAINEY. That kind of information is not of the kind that is valuable to the farmers.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has evidently referred to old statistics, applying to the old long-horn cattle of Argentina. They now have modern Durham beef that is just as good as ours.

Mr. RAINEY. I expected somebody on that side of the House to champion the beef barons of Chicago in their efforts to oppress the farmers of this country, and I am delighted that the Republican leader on that side, speaking for his party, has assumed that burden. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. It is the gentleman who is championing the beef barons by taking the tariff off meat. I am not championing them. I am championing the American farmer, whom the gentleman is trying to put on the scrap heap. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAINEY. You can not make the farmer believe it by that sort of an argument.

Mr. SLOAN. The farmers do believe it.

Mr. MANN. The farmers know it.

Mr. RAINEY. When we bring into this country at a lower price than we are able to get it now, the raw material out of which we make finished beef, we will be able to sell at a lower price than we sell now, and the farmer engaged in animal husbandry will make more money.

Now, we put cattle on the free list. They have tried to bring cattle in from Canada. There are only two places in the world from which cattle can come into this country, and those places are Canada and Mexico. Nearly all the cattle in the Argentine Republic are afflicted with the foot-and-mouth disease, and there is not any country in the world, as I understand it, which permits the importation of live cattle from the Argentine Republic. Talk about cattle with the foot-and-mouth disease competing with our corn-fed beef in the West! Why, no country in the world permits Argentine cattle to leave the vessel on which they arrive alive.

They tried to bring feeders from Canada down into our corn-belt section of the United States, and the result has been a failure. Cattle accustomed to those colder climes do not do well in our warmer climate. But cattle just across the line in Mexico will do well, and just across the Mexican line is the greatest expanse of grasslands in all the world, where grass grows the entire year. Whenever peace is restored there and their herds are replenished, the farmers of the corn belt will be able to get feeding cattle to eat the corn we raise on this land, worth from $250 to $300 an acre, at a price that will enable them to buy and feed and keep up the fertility of their land, worth from $250 to $300 an acre, at a price that will enprofit to themselves. If farmers are unable to get cattle to feed on their lands and keep up soil fertility, their lands will not long retain their present value.

Talk about frightening the farmers of the corn belt with Argentine corn produced by a little army of 500,000 or 600,000 men on 10,000,000 acres of land, competing with 107,000,000 acres of land here and 9,000,000 men producing corn on it. Can a little army like that compete, with the opportunities they have, with the great army of farmers in the corn-belt section of this country? The proposition is absurd. You gentlemen can not frighten the farmers of the corn-belt section of this country. Their ancestors came there when the country was new. They came down the rivers in flatboats and down the long forest avenues in oxcarts, facing the conditions of a frontier, always following our westward-moving frontier. Their grandsons are in the corn belt to-day, producing on the farms they made this tremendous corn crop of the United States. Do you think you can frighten men of that kind by holding up in front of them these scarecrows? Do you gentlemen have such contempt for the corn-belt farmers of your own section that you think you can scare them under such circumstances as these? Do you think your constituents have as little courage as you pretend to believe they have? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. One hour and 15 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to consume some of his time.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, at some future time I hope to make some observations in regard to the tariff as it affects corn and other cereals as well as our meat production. At the present time I only desire to call the attention of the House and the country to certain facts from which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] draws his conclusions.

The gentleman from Illinois has brought with him some samples of Argentine corn, and has invited Members of the House to come down and examine that corn and test it. Gentlemen will remember that the test submitted by the gentleman from Illinois was to have a Member place a grain of corn between his teeth and try to break the corn or bite it. Who ever heard of testing corn in that way? The gentleman says he is a farmer, and this being true I am amazed at his method of testing corn to determine its food qualities. The idea of corn being more valuable because it is soft and palatable to the mouth will be something new to the farmers of the United States. If the gentleman is a farmer, he knows—at least every other farmer in the United States knows—that soft corn is not worth one-third what good dry corn is worth.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman is an expert cattle feeder?

Mr. GOOD. No; I am not an expert cattle feeder.

Mr. RAINEY. I am glad to hear you are not, because I knew you were not or you would not have made those statements.

Mr. GOOD. If I were, I would not feed soft corn, and no expert cattle feeder in the United States would feed soft corn in preference to dry hard corn at the same price.

Mr. RAINEY. Do you think cattle can digest all these grains of hard corn? Why, usually farmers when they feed even our soft corn keep hogs following the cattle in order that they may not waste so much corn, and even hogs, after that corn has passed through the digestive tract of a steer, could not digest it.

Mr. GOOD. By his last statement the gentleman has again given abundant proof that he knows nothing about farming or stock raising.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Agricultural Department under the present administration has caused a chemical analysis to be made of corn grown in Argentina and of corn raised in the United States. I read from page 12 of Farmers Bulletin 581:

TABLE 6.—Chemical composition of four cargoes of Argentine flint corn as discharged at New York and of four cargoes of North American dent corn as loaded for export, calculated to a water-free basis.[1]

Item.	Argentine corn crop of 1912 as imported at New York.	North American corn crops of 1910 and 1911 as loaded for export.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
Ash	1.72	1.43
Ether extract (oil)	5.52	4.07
Protein	11.01	9.81
Crude fiber	1.99	2.18
Pentosans	6.02	6.19
Invert sugar	.30	.38
Sucrose	1.08	1.13
Acid calculated as acetic	.33	.28
Undetermined	72.03	74.53

[1] Chemical analyses of the individual samples made by Cattle Food and Grain Laboratory of the Bureau of Chemistry.

From Table 6 it will be seen that the ether extract or oil was approximately 1.5 per cent greater in the Argentine corn than in the United States corn, while the protein was 1.2 per cent greater.

Here is an analysis, made under the direction of the present Secretary of Agriculture, which shows that the food value of Argentine corn is equal to our own; and yet the gentleman from Illinois would make the House and the country believe that this corn is not fit for food products, but is only useful for chicken feed. If the other statements contained in the gentleman's speech on the subject of agriculture are no more reliable than that statement, then the whole argument he has made in regard to this subject ought to be cast aside as unworthy of consideration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CULLOP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by

Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. 14242) to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States Federal building at Harrisburg, Pa.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5255. An act conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States;

An act (S. 5433) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish the Glacier National Park in the Rocky Mountains south of the international boundary line, in the State of Montana, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1910.

Senate concurrent resolution 22:

Whereas the Government of the United States has erected a monument in Hollywood Cemetery at Richmond, Va., over the grave of President John Tyler; and

Whereas exercises will be held very soon to unveil the said monument, and it being considered very appropriate that the Senate and House of Representatives should be properly represented on this occasion: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a committee of 10 members be appointed, 5 by the President of the Senate and 5 by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to represent the Congress of the United States to attend said ceremonies, and authority is hereby given to expend $250 from the contingent fund of the Senate and $250 from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to defray the expenses of said committee, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and the Committee on Accounts of the House of Representatives, respectively.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

[Mr. AUSTIN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, criticism is one of the functions of the minority; in fact, in this Congress, where the majority determines everything in caucus, it is about the only function that is left to the minority. It is always a useful function, because no matter how good the administration may be I believe it will be better if it knows that its conduct is being watched and its derelictions likely to be exposed.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not that largely account for the splendid administration this country has had in the past under Republican rule?

Mr. GILLETT. I am inclined to think it would have been very splendid without a minority party, though I am willing to admit that fear of detection may have prevented some abuses. Now, as a member of the minority of this committee it is a part of my function to criticize this bill. I will say frankly at the outset that its general features do not call upon me for criticism. I, of course, do not approve of many items in it. There are many I would change, but I expect that that is true even of the chairman of the committee, who of course has more voice in the formation of the bill than anybody else.

A bill consisting of thousands of items pertaining to the administration of the whole country can not be formulated as any one man would wish it. There has to be taken into consideration the temper of the House, the temper of the country, the temper even of the Senate, and possibilities of success have to be considered, so that no bill is perfect to the mind of any one man. I am ready to admit that in my judgment this is a very good bill and upon its general aspects I desire to make no criticism. If it is not much worse when the House and Senate shall have acted on it I shall be both pleased and surprised.

But there are a few incidents which occurred in the hearings which I will advert to briefly, not particularly important in themselves, but indicating the spirit and tendency of this administration.

The committee's report at the outset speaks of a reduction of nearly $17,000,000 below the appropriations for the last fiscal year. We all know that economy was the great cry of the Democratic Party till they were elected, and while that statement of a reduction is correct, I think it is but fair to point out that that is not largely the result from any economies by this committee. For instance, of the $17,000,000, $8,000,000 are in the expenditure for public buildings in the coming year as against last year. Now, we are not economizing in public buildings, but it happened that the last bill appropriated for 18 months and this bill provides for only 9 months, so that accounts for the saving of $8,000,000.

The same is true of river and harbor appropriations. Last year we appropriated for 18 months as against 9 this year, and there $3,000,000 is saved. In Panama we save $2,000,000 this year in the combined cost of the fortifications and the expenses of the canal, because our fortifications are mainly completed. That is no particular credit to those who framed the bill. Last year we had an appropriation of $3,000,000 for the Capitol grounds and that is completed. So there are $16,000,000 that has dropped out accidentally and not as a matter of economy.

I should state in fairness that against this there is an additional appropriation of three and a half million dollars for the Interstate Commerce Commission which we did not have last year. There are a number of other smaller savings of a similar character, and I simply point out these facts to indicate that this saving of $16,000,000 can not fairly be claimed as an economy of this year over the last.

Now, as I stated, there are a number of small matters which I wish to refer to briefly as subject to criticism. One is the failure of the heads of the departments of this administration to attend the hearings of the committee. Since I have been on the Appropriations Committee it has been the custom for the heads of the departments to come before that committee and give us the benefit of their judgment, their opinions, their wisdom, and point out their policy and tell us why they made the estimates and why they desire these appropriations.

This year, except in the case of the Department of Commerce, the head of which has been very recently a Member of this House, not one of the heads of departments came before us. They sent down their subordinates. Possibly their subordinates knew much more than they did about the matters that we were investigating; but it is always well to have the man who is responsible, who outlines the policy of the department, before the committee, not only to volunteer information but to give us an opportunity to question him about that policy. I do not suppose there was any unwillingness to subject themselves to such inquiry, but for some reason or other no head of a department appeared. I remember in one case the head of a department did not appear when we were considering an appropriation for one of his bureaus of about $3,000,000. We could not get the head of the bureau nor the deputy, and we were referred for all information to the clerk of the department, who knew less about the subject than did the clerk of our committee.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a statement along the same line?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. It has always been the custom of committees to refer many bills to the departments for report upon them. It used to be the custom for the head of a department to sign the report, which indicated, very often, the policy of the head of the department. The custom now is for some assistant secretary to sign the report, expresing his opinion upon it, and nobody knows whether that expresses the views of the head of the department or the views of some clerk. It is a reprehensible practice, I think, that has recently grown up.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman if the committee requested the presence of the members of the Cabinet?

Mr. GILLETT. We sent notice to each, I suppose. I do not know certainly, and I will ask the chairman about that. I assume that notice was sent requesting the heads of the departments to appear.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, invariable practice of the Committee on Appropriations when matters are under investigation is to send to the chief clerk of the department notice that hearings are to be conducted upon certain subjects, and stating that the committee would be pleased to have the head of the departments appear, if it be convenient or desirable for him to attend.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I now turn to one of the hearings which brought out facts properly subject to criticism. It appears in the hearings, page 1683, that on January 8 last the Secretary of the Treasury sent a letter to the Comptroller of the Treasury, telling him that he wished to provide rooms in the Treasury Building for the new reserve board, and stating at length the importance of changing some of the arrangements in the building to provide suitable quarters for the reserve board, and asking the comptroller whether under the law he had a right to expend the $100,000 which had been appropriated for the expenses of the reserve board in preparation for these quarters or whether they must be paid from the regular appropriation for maintenance of the Treasury Building. Of course, this House is familiar with the functions of the Comptroller of the Treasury. He is practically a judicial officer. It is his duty to interpret for all the accounting officers of the departments the acts of Congress. If they are uncertain whether they can make an expenditure, they apply to the Comptroller of the Treasury and he interprets the act and informs them whether they can or can not make the desired expenditure, and his ruling is final, and if they disregard his ruling or if they run the risk that he will rule favorably, and he does not, their accounts are disallowed.

The Secretary of the Treasury, naturally aware of that, and apparently from his letter aware of the fact that it was questionable whether he had the right to make this expenditure in the Treasury Building as he desired, sent this letter on January 8 to the comptroller, and on January 17 the comptroller answered the letter and told him, as was quite obvious from the ordinary precedents, that inasmuch as there was a specific appropriation for making changes in the Treasury Building a general appropriation could not be diverted to that same use. That is a precedent which has been followed invariably by the Comptrollers of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury, apparently acquiescing in this axiomatic decision, came to Congress and requested that special authority should be given him to expend money for changing the rooms in the Treasury as he desired. Congress declined to give him the desired authority. What reason the majority of Congress had in declining to give it to him I am not at all aware; but the fact appears that the request was made, that it was refused, and therefore the Secretary of the Treasury was limited to the amount which had theretofore been appropriated for the Treasury in order to provide the quarters he desired for the reserve board. Instead of acquiescing in this decision, the Secretary of the Treasury on the 6th of April wrote another letter to the comptroller, stating more fully the reasons why he desired to provide quarters for the reserve board in the Treasury Building, and that the regular appropriation was insufficient for that purpose, and asked the comptroller to revise his decision and reconsider it. On the 8th of April, two days after the receipt of that letter, the affable and accommodating comptroller wrote back to his chief a letter in which he quoted the letter to him, and I attach herewith both letters.

The letters are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, January 17, 1914.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: I have your letter of the 8th instant as follows:

"Your attention is respectfully invited to part of the Federal reserve act found at page 3 (Public No. 43, 63d Cong.), as follows:

"'* * * The organization committee shall have power to appoint such assistants and incur such expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act as it shall deem necessary, and such expenses shall be payable by the Treasurer of the United States upon voucher approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of such expenses.'

"Under the provisions of the foregoing section and other parts of the act which authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to quarter the Federal Reserve Board in this building, the department feels that the above appropriation is available for such expenses as may be actually necessary in providing suitable space for the board in the Treasury Building. The contingent appropriation made by Congress for the upkeep of the Treasury Building is not sufficient to properly accommodate and house the members of the Federal Reserve Board. It is considered necessary that each member of said board ought to be provided with a large room and a small anteroom. The present construction of the quarters which it is proposed to assign the Federal Reserve Board is not at all adapted or suited to their purposes, and it will be necessary to erect certain partitions and make other changes.

"The premises considered, your opinion is respectfully requested as to whether the views of the department are correct that the foregoing appropriation of $100,000 is available for putting in proper shape the quarters for the Federal Reserve Board."

The Federal reserve act constitutes the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency as the "Reserve Bank Organization Committee," and authorizes the committee, among other things—

"To employ counsel and expert aid, to take testimony, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to make such investigations as may be deemed necessary by the said committee in determining the reserve districts and designating the cities within such districts where such Federal reserve banks shall be severally located."

The act also empowers the organization committee to appoint such assistants and incur such expenses in carrying out the provisions of the act as it may deem necessary, and the appropriation quoted in your submission is made for the payment of such expenses.

The act also creates a Federal Reserve Board and provides (Public No. 43, p. 11) that—

"The Secretary of the Treasury may assign offices in the Department of the Treasury for the use of the Federal Reserve Board."

The changes contemplated being made because of the assigning of offices to the members of the Federal Reserve Board are not specifically stated other than "it will be necessary to erect certain partitions and make other changes."

Section 10 of the act (p. 11) provides:

"The Federal Reserve Board shall have power to levy semiannually upon the Federal reserve banks, in proportion to their capital stock and surplus, an assessment sufficient to pay its estimated expenses and salaries of its members and employees for the half year succeeding the levying of such assessment, together with any deficit carried forward from the preceding half year."

For many years specific appropriations have been made by Congress for the upkeep of the Treasury Building. The appropriations therefor for the current fiscal year, as made by the sundry civil act of June 23, 1913 (Public No. 3, p. 13–14), are as follows:

"Repairs and preservation of public buildings: For repairs and preservation of all completed and occupied public buildings and the grounds thereof under the control of the Treasury Department, and for wire screens therefor, Government wharves and piers under the control of the Treasury Department, together with the necessary dredging adjacent thereto, buildings and wharf at Sitka, Alaska, * * * : Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated, not exceeding $100,000, may be used for marine hospitals and quarantine stations, including wire screens for same, and not exceeding $12,000 for the Treasury, Butler, and Winder Buildings at Washington, D. C. * * *

"Mechanical equipment of public buildings: For installation and repair of mechanical equipment in all completed and occupied public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, including heating, hoisting, plumbing, gas piping, ventilating, vacuum cleaning, and refrigerating apparatus, electric-light plants, meters, interior pneumatic tube and intercommunicating telephone systems, conduit, wiring, call-bell and signal systems, and for maintenance and repair of tower clocks: * * *: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated for mechanical equipment of public buildings, not exceeding $40,000 may be used for marine hospitals and quarantine stations, and not exceeding $9,000 for the Treasury, Butler, and Winder Buildings at Washington, D. C."

The use to which the appropriations last quoted have been put is shown by the following statements made by the chief clerk of the Treasury Department and the Supervising Architect before the House Committee on Appropriations (see hearings, sundry civil bill, 1914):

"Mr. WILMETH (p. 180). We probably could take care of that one item (painting and window frames) out of our maintenance fund. I want to say in connection with that, Mr. Chairman, there is $12,000 for repairs and preservation of the Treasury, Butler, and Winder Buildings, under which that particular item would come. That appropriation is used for everything in connection with these three buildings, except mechanical equipment. You give us, I think, $9,000 for mechanical equipment for the same buildings. There is 500,000 square feet of floor space in those three buildings. All of these buildings are old. That is not quite enough money to keep them up in proper shape."

"Mr. WENDEROTH (p. 101). Twelve thousand dollars is for repairs and preservation and $9,000 for mechanical equipment, or the other way around. Out of repairs and preservation there is an allotment of $12,000, and out of mechanical equipment an allotment of $9,000; that is, for all three buildings each year—Treasury, Butler, and Winder Buildings—and is for ordinary repairs, such as repairs to roof, changing of a partition now and then, cutting a door through, or something of that kind."

It is well established that the continued use of an appropriation should be consistent with the former use, where not clearly wrong, in the absence of a change in the appropriation acts by Congress.

I have the honor to advise you that the appropriations last quoted above, viz, "Repairs and preservation of public buildings" and "Mechanical equipment, public buildings," is more specific than the one quoted in your submission, and is therefore exclusively applicable for the expenses of making such changes in the building as erecting partitions, cutting doors, etc.

Respectfully,

GEO. E. DOWNEY, Comptroller.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, April 8, 1914.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: I have your communication of the 6th instant, requesting reconsideration of a former decision of this office, and for the purpose of the better addressing my reply to the facts stated it is quoted in full, as follows:

"On behalf of myself as Secretary of the Treasury and as chairman of the reserve bank organization committee under the Federal reserve act, I desire to submit for your decision certain matters relative to the work necessary to be done preliminary to the organization of the Federal Reserve Board, in order that said board may be equipped for the proper discharge of its duties under the act, the expenses thereof to be paid from the appropriation of $100,000 carried by the said act.

"The Federal reserve act (Public, No. 43) creates 'the reserve bank organization committee,' and this committee is given broad powers extending not only to the creation of Federal reserve districts and the designation of Federal reserve cities, but also to the supervision of the preliminary organization of the reserve banks, the calling of subscriptions, etc.

"It was the evident intention of Congress that the organization committee should turn over to the reserve board a created system ready to be put into operation.

"These matters are only important for the purposes of this submission, because they show the necessity that the reserve board should be properly equipped for the transaction of its business from the very day of its organization.

"It is highly essential that the machinery of the system be ready to be put into operation upon the organization of the reserve board, and it is submitted that any interruptions or delays at that time incident to the preparation of quarters or the purchase of equipment for the use of the board will be very detrimental.

"The act provides that 'the Secretary of the Treasury may assign offices in the Department of the Treasury for the use of the Federal Reserve Board.' The word 'may,' I understand, is frequently construed as meaning 'shall' or 'must,' and such interpretation seems to be required in this instance, for the reason there is no authority contained in the act for the renting of quarters elsewhere.

"Space has been assigned the board in the Treasury Building in compliance with the terms of the act, but such space has heretofore been used for the most part by clerks, and the rooms as laid out are by no means suitable or properly equipped for the purposes of the members of the board. As the rooms now stand, some members of the board would have more room than necessary; others would not have sufficient room, and all the members of the board would have no privacy nor places for their stenographers and secretaries except in the rooms with the members of the board. Considerable rearrangements of the rooms are necessary for the proper handling of the business of the board.

"The act appropriates $100,000 for such expenses as the organization committee may deem necessary in carrying out the provisions of the act, and provides for payment thereof on vouchers approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"It is believed that Congress intended to vest in the organization committee and the Secretary of the Treasury an absolute discretion in the matter of expenditures within the limits of said appropriation, and that any expenditure necessary in the judgment of the committee preliminary to the turning of the system over to the reserve board, including proper rearrangement of rooms and equipment necessary for the transaction of its business by the board, is properly within the appropriation.

"The organization committee has determined that an expenditure of approximately $15,000 from the appropriation in question, for the purposes above stated, is an expense necessary to be incurred in carrying out the provisions of the said act.

"The submission of this question to you on January 8, 1914, upon which your decision of January 17, 1914, was predicated, was not made by me personally, and did not present the considerations which in my judgment ought to be conclusive. I have, therefore, to request reconsideration of your said decision of January 17, 1914, and to submit whether or not, on the statement of facts herein contained, the indicated expenditures from the appropriation in question may not be authorized."

The considerations suggested by you were not, as stated, brought to my attention when the question was previously considered. They present a condition quite apart from anything ordinarily for consideration in connection with such matters.

There is no necessity for repetition of facts stated, and upon your presentment of them I am led to conclude that if the reserve bank organization committee has determined, as stated, that the proposed expenditure is an expense necessary to be incurred in carrying out the provisions of the Federal reserve act the appropriation in question may be used therefor.

Vouchers for such expenditures should be certified as authorized by the organization committee and should be approved by you.

Respectfully,

GEO. E. DOWNEY, Comptroller.

Mr. GILLETT. You will observe that it took the comptroller nine days to answer the first letter and give his first opinion, but it only took him two days after receipt of the Secretary's second letter to reverse himself and give his chief the authority he had so urgently asked for.

It is easy to see the position in which the comptroller was placed. He is a judicial officer. Upon him was the duty of interpreting the acts of Congress, of saying what could be expended and what could not; but, and here is the point, he was an appointive officer. He had no tenure except at the will of his superior, and his superior was the Secretary of the Treasury. He is not in the civil service. He had been recently appointed by this administration. The Comptroller of the Treasury, who had rendered excellent service for many years, who had given admirable decisions, who had acquired experience and knowledge, had been unceremoniously dropped from the rolls by the incoming administration, and this present comptroller had been appointed. Then when the administration wished a particular appropriation, after the comptroller had once decided on the perfectly plain and patent facts that the appropriation was unjustified, the Secretary, his superior, wrote to him again, not arguing the question of law at all, which the comptroller had previously stated, but putting at greater length the reasons which he had before stated, why the authority was desirable, and the comptroller, subject to removal, uncertain of his tenure, promptly acquiesced in his wishes, and wisely, perhaps, does not discuss the law at all, but simply states that the Secretary's letter is convincing and conclusive. As a ruling by a law officer it is humorous.

Mr. Chairman, I am not much disposed to blame the poor Comptroller of the Treasury. He was there holding office at the will of his superior, and his superior asked of him, and pressed upon him, for a certain judicial decision, and he yielded, but I am disposed to criticize the Secretary of the Treasury for bringing that pressure to bear upon his subordinate. There were times, which have gone by, I am happy to say and to believe, such as are sometimes referred to as "the good, old times," when the administration in power had absolute control of all of its subordinates, when the spoils system flourished, when an administration was recognized as holding office and making appointments for the good of the party. There is a tradition that in those times, which I trust have passed forever, the President of the United States once sent for the Comptroller of the Treasury, who had made a decision which balked some purpose of his, and reasoned with him, trying to induce him to reverse his decision, but the comptroller answered his arguments with other arguments and was obstinate. The President found that he could not convince him that he was wrong, and so finally said, "Well, I can not make you change your mind, but I can change my comptroller." Tradition has it that under that very forcible argument the comptroller saw a new light and reversed his decision.

I do not know what pressure there was in the present case more than the letter which is published, but it seems to me it is not creditable for a department officer to bring such pressure to bear upon a comptroller to reverse a judicial decision, particularly after he has once acquiesced in it and come to Congress and asked Congress to give him the appropriation he wished. After having failed in that, after his own party in Congress had decided that his wishes should not be granted, then he ought not to try again to get from the comptroller an opinion which allows him to do his will contrary to the wishes of his own party majority in Congress. It seems to me that is an improper interference with a judicial officer. I believe the comptroller ought to be made independent of any department or the President, even. I believe he is a judicial officer who is the only barrier between the different departments and the Treasury, and I believe that barrier ought not to be weakened, but to be made absolutely independent. I believe in some way he should be made independent of the Treasury Department or any other department, and this to me illustrates the need of such a law, although I do not believe such illustrations have often happened. There is much discussion nowadays about the independence of the judiciary. Some think the judiciary are too independent of the people. Personally I believe the judiciary should be absolutely independent. I believe the practice in my State of the governor appointing the judiciary for life has given us a splendid judiciary, which has the confidence of every class in the community more than in any other State in the Union. But whatever some believe about the independence of the judiciary of the people, I believe all agree that the judiciary ought to be independent of the Executive, and here is an officer whose functions are purely judicial and yet who is dependent for his place upon his superiors in office and liable to removal if his opinions do not conform to their wishes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman says that the judiciary in Massachusetts are now appointed by the governor for life?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has that always been the system?

Mr. GILLETT. Always.

Mr. BARTLETT. They have never been elected by the legislature or the people?

Mr. GILLETT. I think never.

Mr. BARTLETT. I thought there was a time when they were elected.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think they ever have been. I saw recently what seemed to me another instance of interference by the administration with a body with judicial functions. A new office was created in the Interstate Commercce Commission, the office of counsel, at a new and largely increased salary. Before then the salary, I think, had been $5,000; suddenly there was an increase of the salary to $10,000, and simultaneously a gentleman of great political distinction was appointed to that office, Gov. Folk. Now, I have no criticism upon Gov. Folk. As far as I know, he has in political life led a distinguished and admirable career.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Was that office created by act of Congress and the salary fixed?

Mr. GILLETT. No.

Mr. GARNER. Then, by what authority was this office created and the salary placed at the figure which the gentleman has stated?

Mr. GILLETT. The commission had absolute power, I think.

Mr. GARNER. Paid out of the bulk appropriation?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes. Now, before that the commission had been admirably served, as far as I know, by the counsel at $5,000. Gov. Folk, who had always been a sturdy supporter of the Secretary of State, who had distinction politically, but I never heard of his having distinction as a lawyer, was appointed Solicitor for the State Department, at a salary of $5,000. When the Interstate Commerce Commission created this new office of counsel at $10,000, does anybody believe that, looking throughout the country to find a lawyer who would best fill that position, a lawyer who had been actively familiar with the kind of work which would come before the counsel of that commission—does anybody suspect that for a moment they would have thought of the Solicitor of the State Department? I do not. I believe myself that experience along this line was one of the characteristics that would have been demanded. To be sure, I believe the Secretary of State thinks that experience in diplomatic life, at least, is not at all essential; that it does not contribute to efficiency and performance of duty. Perhaps he thought that same way in reference to the appointment of counsel to the Interstate Commerce Commission. That is the only argument I can think of for the appointment.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I do.

Mr. CLINE. Does not the gentleman think that a man capable of revealing the rottenness of the New Haven Railroad system is worth $10,000 a year?

Mr. GILLETT. All that has been accomplished there might have been done by any incipient lawyer. What I have heard of the gentleman's conduct of that examination does not reflect credit upon his ability, though I did not wish to say anything about that.

Mr. CLINE. Does not the gentleman think the office of counsel to the Interstate Commerce Commission is important enough to command a salary of $10,000 a year, although there might be a man of lesser ability in the position than that required. In other words, is not the importance of the office such as to justify the appointment of a $10,000 man?

Mr. GILLETT. I think very likely it is. I do not criticize the salary of the office. What I am criticizing is that I can not repress the suspicion that the appointment of the well-known person who fills that position was not upon merit, but was pressed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission for political reasons.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Did the gentleman ever hear any criticism of the law officers of the Interstate Commerce Commission who had charge of the law business of that commission before this raise of salary was made?

Mr. GILLETT. On the contrary, I never heard anything but praise of them.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman remember any other case or any previous case where the Interstate Commerce Commission made a political appointment?

Mr. GILLETT. Well, the gentleman who has been chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee is much better versed than I am, and I would like to ask him that question.

Mr. MANN. I never have; I have always thought the Interstate Commerce Commission was considered free from politics.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit me, it was not a political appointment. The Interstate Commerce Commission is not in sympathy with the administration politically.

Mr. MANN. If this was not a political appointment, I do not know what political appointments are.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman was a prominent person, there is no reason why it should be called a political appointment.

Mr. MANN. Because a man who was a candidate for President and then was not selected, and because he had a friendly Secretary of State was appointed Solicitor of the Department of State, a cheap job for a candidate for the Presidency, and then wanted a better job, and the Interstate Commerce Commission or the administration was forced to appoint this man to the place, I would consider that a political appointment.

Mr. HENSLEY. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly I will yield.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HENSLEY].

Mr. HENSLEY. Has the gentleman from Illinois taken into consideration the fact that Gov. Folk, as circuit attorney in the city of St. Louis, has a record that the whole country is familiar with, as an able lawyer, as a prosecutor of graft and fraud, and so on, and that as governor of Missouri he was a distinguished official?

Mr. MANN. He was a good prosecuting attorney, I believe—so much so that he made a great many enemies in the Democratic Party in Missouri. But that was no excuse for putting him in as counsel of the Interstate Commerce Commission at double the salary that was ever paid to anyone before, when there was no complaint of the legal services being furnished to that commission.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggests that being mentioned as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States is somewhat connected with the disqualification.

Now, I want to suggest that I have heard recently the gentleman from Illinois himself suggested as an adequate and proper man to be a candidate on the Republican ticket for President of the United States. Does that disqualify the gentleman from serving in an important position? I will say from the reports I get from my State the people are proud of the work of Gov. Folk.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts agrees that this office is sufficiently important to command a salary of $10,000 a year, and as to the qualifications of Gov. Folk we all have, possibly, our separate opinions. As far as I can see, he seems to be making good so far. I want to ask the gentleman if the public policy in reference to making lump-sum appropriations and permitting the heads of departments to pay any salary they see proper out of that for services is not a bad public policy, and ought not these salaries to be fixed by Congress and through the Appropriations Committee rather than by making lump-sum appropriations and permitting such salaries as the departments may see proper?

Mr. GILLETT. I quite agree with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I want to say in the absence of my Democratic colleagues from Nebraska, in answer to the charge of the gentleman from Illinois that the Secretary of State, who is a distinguished citizen of Nebraska, had something to do with this political appointment, that I deprecate that charge. I am sorry it was said, because I do not believe he would have had a hand in making an appointment if it smattered or smacked or savored of politics.

Mr. GILLETT. I appreciate the satiric humor of the gentleman's remark, but we have wandered far afield from what I intended. What I wanted to say was that, in my opinion, this was another instance where the administration had used political influence upon a body which is largely judicial in its functions. I think it is properly subject to criticism, and I deplore it.

Mr. GARNER. Why can not the Appropriations Committee, as it has done in this bill in a number of instances, limit these lump appropriations with the provision that the salary shall not be increased over the present salary until they have come back to Congress and gotten authority to do so, in order that Congress may keep its hand on the Treasury in the matter of increasing salaries until they have come back and consulted you gentlemen and Congress with reference to what we shall pay?

Mr. GILLETT. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman as to that policy, and it is true to-day with nearly all the departments of the Government. The Interstate Commerce Commission is an exception, as its province and functions to-day are very exceptional.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman, of course, knows that since the last Congress there have been quite a number of additional duties placed upon the Interstate Commerce Commission—the matter of the valuation of railroads, and that sort of thing—and the gentleman also knows that the railroads have attorneys employed specially here in Washington to represent them in that matter to whom they pay very large fees. In view of this increased duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission and responsibilities in that and other matters, I understand the gentleman to say he does not complain at the amount of the salary?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not complain of that, although I understand Gov. Folk has nothing to do with the railroad valuation branch. I complain of what I suspect to be the projection of political influence on the Interstate Commerce Commission, because I do not believe they would have ever selected the man they did select if left to their own judgment.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman think a better choice could have been made than the ex-governor of Missouri?

Mr. GILLETT. I do. But I do not wish to go into personalities and discuss that.

Mr. FOWLER. In the light of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said, that Mr. Folk in his prosecutions as district attorney in St. Louis has divided the Democratic Party, do you think in the light of that it is very much of a political appointment?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly there has been no division between him and the Secretary of State. But I do not care to discuss that further.

Mr. HENSLEY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GILLETT. Not on that point any further.

Now, I wish to turn to another instance. The Democratic platform says:

> We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which befits a democratic government and a reduction in the number of useless offices, the salaries of which drain the substance of the people.

Economy, you know, was the watchword on which you went into power, and we have been looking to see a few of those useless offices dropped off, but there came to my attention in the course of our hearings an order which has recently been promulgated by the President which indicates the kind of Democratic economy which is being practiced in destroying useless offices.

There was put in an appropriation bill this winter by Congress an appropriation of $25,000 for opening the Panama Canal and giving the President authority to provide a committee to superintend it. Whom did the President appoint on that committee, and how was that $25,000 to be spent? The President appointed on the committee Col. George W. Goethals, Hon. Richard L. Metcalfe, Col. William C. Gorgas, Col. H. F. Hodges, Col. William L. Sibert, and Civil Engineer H. R. Rousseau. All of these were engineers in the construction of the canal, except Mr. Metcalfe and Col. Gorgas, who was head of the department of sanitation.

Hon. Richard L. Metcalfe was, I believe, an editor of the Commoner, and was appointed when this administration came into power as governor of the Canal Zone, at a salary of $14,000 and a residence—probably the most lavishly remunerated office in the whole Government, considering the work which was to be done. You may remember, also, that he made a report suggesting that the new government of the canal should be vested in a commission of three, and not a single-headed government. But I am happy to say the President did not approve that, and Col. Goethals was appointed governor of the Canal Zone.

It seems to me that Col. Goethals and the officers with him were amply qualified to arrange the ceremonies for inaugurating the canal; yet it seems that it was considered necessary that Hon. Richard L. Metcalfe should also be appointed on that committee, and by the President's order each member of that committee was to receive an annual salary of $10,000, from which was to be deducted any salaries they were already receiving from the Government. Now, Col. Goethals, as governor, was already receiving a salary of $10,000, and Col. Hodges was receiving $10,000, and Mr. Rousseau was receiving $10,000. Col. Sibert had accepted a mission to China, with leave of absence, during which he should draw nothing from the United States, so that he could draw nothing of this $25,000. Col. Gorgas was the only person who had connection with the construction of the canal who would receive anything from it. He is now Surgeon General of the Army, receiving a salary of $6,000, so that his salary would be increased at the rate of $4,000 a year.

I am glad myself, considering the eminent and inestimable services that Col. Gorgas performed in the sanitation of the Canal Zone, that he should get this recognition of a small addition to his salary. But I can see no reason why Hon. Richard L. Metcalfe should be given $10,000 a year, to be joined with these men on this committee in preparing for the opening of the Panama Canal. I believe the other gentlemen have sufficient capacity and sufficient familiarity with the canal to perform their functions unaided, without the distinguished assistance of the associate editor of the Commoner.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. That amendment was put on in the Senate, I believe?

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, no. That was the order of the President.

Mr. BARTLETT. I mean the appropriation. It was put on the urgent deficiency bill in the Senate?

Mr. GILLETT. I have forgotten about that. Very likely it was.

Mr. BARTLETT. And the gentleman was on the conference?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. And if the gentleman had agreed with somebody else on the conference the House would likely have gotten an opportunity to vote for or against it?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not remember that.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think I remember that it was discussed in conference, and that two of the conferees were in favor of it.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know as to that.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. Is it not true that the law providing for the construction of the Panama Canal provided for the members of the board that governed the canal and fixed the salaries?

Mr. GILLETT. Which law?

Mr. BARTON. The law covering the management of the canal.

Mr. GILLETT. This was for the opening of the canal.

Mr. MANN. It did not. It did not fix the salaries.

Mr. BARTON. Did not the President fix the salaries, and appropriations were made for them?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. And these positions were filled previously to this time, and the salaries were drawn?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. Is there anything unusual for even a member of another party filling a position, if he has the qualifications to do so, drawing the same salary?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not understand the gentleman's question and I do not catch his point.

Mr. BARTON. Is there not authority vested in the Secretary of War to make the appointments to both of these positions?

Mr. GILLETT. No; it was the President who made them. The President made the appointment. I have seen the order issued by the President.

Mr. BARTON. Recommended by the Secretary of War?

Mr. GILLETT. Very likely.

Mr. BARTON. And not from the State Department?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know. I do not know who recommended it. The President makes the order, and it is on his authority.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. President, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. In order to ascertain just how much of this fund will go to Mr. Metcalfe, how long does this board continue?

Mr. GILLETT. It continues for nine months.

Mr. GARNER. From his appointment?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; from his appointment.

Mr. GARNER. So that he will draw a salary at the rate of $10,000 a year for nine months incident to the opening of the canal?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes. And that recalls a singular incident in connection with this matter. The President's order was dated May 20, appointing this commission, but in the order he provides that the salary shall date back and commence on April 1, so that from April 1 to May 20, when the commission was not in existence, the salary is to be paid. It is also a singular coincidence that Mr. Metcalfe's former salary as governor ended on April 1, so that by making the pay for this new position date back to April 1—50 days before the position was created—there was no hiatus in the salary drawn from the Government by Mr. Metcalfe.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I regret very much that the gentleman has criticized the appointment of Mr. Metcalfe, a resident of our State and a distinguished and able gentleman; and I think I might say this as an absolute truth, that if appointments under this administration averaged 60 per cent as high as Mr. Metcalfe it would tend to increase the life of this otherwise short-lived administration. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. GILLETT. I am very glad to have the gentleman's assurance, because I do not have the honor of a personal acquaintance with the gentleman; and please understand that I am not saying this with the slightest reflection upon him. I accept the gentleman's assurance that he is amply fit for a high position as well as this purely ornamental one. But my contention is that here is a position created with absolutely no function for this gentleman to perform. No matter how able and admirable he might be, he could not exhibit his ability here. Col. Goethals and these other gentlemen are quite qualified to perform all the functions of this commission, and here simply a place is being created at a salary of $10,000 for the apparent purpose of giving the gentleman from Nebraska a solace for losing his position as governor of the zone at $14,000.

Now, I do not criticize him for accepting the position. What I do criticize is the administration for appointing him to this position, which is absolutely unnecessary. If there is need of somebody in Washington, here is Col. Gorgas, Surgeon General of the Army, who is receiving $4,000 a year in addition to what he would otherwise receive. He could certainly attend to what is needed to be done at this end of the line. And we all believe that Col. Goethals and the other gentlemen, who do not get any addition to their salaries, can attend to what is necessary at the other end.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Metcalfe was a member of the Isthmian Canal Commission, designated as the civil governor.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the deficiency bill passed in April a provision was inserted authorizing the President to appoint a commission to arrange ceremonies for the formal opening of the canal, the commission to consist of persons who had been members or were members of the Isthmian Canal Commission. Under the provisions of the law would it not have been a discrimination that could not have been justified if the President had appointed everyone else on the commission and excluded Mr. Metcalfe? For instance, the provision is—

For the purpose of paying the expenses of formally and officially opening the Panama Canal as provided in section 4 of the Panama Canal act, including the compensation of such persons as may be appointed by the President to provide for such opening under the direction of the governor of the Panama Canal, the President is authorized to use out of the moneys heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the construction, completion, operation, or maintenance of the Panama Canal the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary. The appointment of persons in the military and naval service of the United States is hereby expressly authorized.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not see that that says anything about appointing members of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Our understanding——

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know anything about the understanding. There is the law which you yourself have read.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that in the communication sent by the President, upon which this provision was inserted in the law, the statement was made that it was the purpose to appoint on this commission those persons who had been serving on the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Mr. GILLETT. Very likely; but that information was never communicated to me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am quite sure the gentleman saw it, because, as he well knows, I keep nothing from him, and he is as completely possessed of all the information I have about such matters as I am myself.

Mr. GILLETT. I thank the gentleman for his complimentary statement, though I suspect he means it humorously. Shortly after that time I do remember hearing gossip, or a report that this position was created in order to give a place to Mr. Metcalfe.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does the gentleman recall that there was a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, which was read in conference, and which, in the discussion of the conference report I called attention to, and printed it in the RECORD, and read it to the House.

Mr. GILLETT. I had forgotten the fact.

Mr. BARTLETT. And when the conference report was considered, I, myself, objected to that amendment to the bill in conference and on the floor of the House, and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will yield just there, the gentleman from Georgia has made a very important statement concerning this matter in connection with the gentleman from Massachusetts. If I understand, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] says that in conference he objected to agreeing to this amendment. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] was on that conference committee, and he is now condemning the appropriation.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. GARNER. If he had joined with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], the conference committee could not possibly have agreed to this item.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman is mistaken. I am not criticizing this appropriation. What I am criticizing is the appointment that is made under the appropriation.

Mr. GARNER. But the statement has just been made that the gentleman from Massachusetts was aware of the fact as to who it was contemplated would be appointed.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not remember ever seeing that letter.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has just said that it was well known in the conference committee that he had a communication from the President that he was going to appoint these identical officials to these positions.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman has not stated that fact.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts did know that fact——

Mr. GILLETT. I did not.

Mr. GARNER. And if he did agree to the conference report over the protest of one of his fellow conferees, he was in a position to defeat it, and should not now condemn it.

Mr. GILLETT. As I say, I do not remember any such letter as the chairman of the committee speaks of, and I do not believe it was brought to my attention.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I want to plead guilty to some of this. The gentleman knows there was a very bitter conflict going on as to whether there should be an efficient government in the Panama Canal Zone, with Col. Goethals at the head of it, or whether there should be a political, inefficient government, composed of a commission; in which controversy a very distinguished gentleman having a very high standing with the present administration was exercising influence. It was proposed—the gentleman may not know that it was proposed, but I know it, because I was one of those consulted—that the advocacy of the inefficient government might be dissipated by making an appropriation which would take care of all the members of the Isthmian Canal Commission until the canal was officially opened; and that in common with a good many other Members of the House who believed in an efficient government under Col. Goethals down there, while we considered that we were being somewhat held up, we thought the price was cheap at $25,000.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not remember any such occurrence.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Of course these obiter dicta statements by the gentleman from Illinois will not be regarded as of very much importance; but if the gentleman will permit me. I should like to call his attention to a communication, under date of February 28 last, sent to me by the President. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] saw the letter. He may have forgotten it, but, with his permission, I shall print it in the RECORD.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to hear it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The President wrote to me as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 28, 1914.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, United States, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: In accordance with the authority given me by the Panama Canal act I have issued an Executive order doing away with the Isthmian Canal Commission and establishing the permanent government of the Canal Zone under a governor, to take effect April 1, 1914.

As a result of this action the services of several members of the Isthmian Canal Commission will no longer be needed, and they will therefore discontinue their official connection with the Panama Canal.

I feel that after the able work done on the Isthmus by the Isthmian Canal Commission these members should have some official connection with the formal opening of the Panama Canal, which was directed under the Panama Canal act and which is set for approximately the first of next year. In order to cover this matter it has been suggested that these gentlemen might be appointed to a special commission, which should, under the governor, have charge of and be present at the formal opening of the canal, such commission to serve for a compensation which would be set by me. In order that these gentlemen may have their formal service with the Panama Canal continuous, it is desired that I be authorized to announce the commission at an early date, and if practicable, before the abolition of the Isthmian Canal Commission. I would therefore suggest the advisability of adding to the urgent deficiency bill a clause which will give me the necessary authority, it being noted that the Comptroller of the Treasury has ruled that I have not the authority to make payment to such a commission under existing appropriations. The clause referred to is as follows:

And then was set forth the draft of the clause desired, and, as I recall, the only change made in it was the insertion of the words "under the direction of the governor of the Panama Canal." The President's letter stated that the commission was to act under his direction; and so that there might be no misunderstanding and no conflict the provision suggested was modified by the insertion of those words; and the order which has been issued appointing the commission, if I recall correctly, designates Col. Goethals as chairman. As the order now stands, it provides that the commission shall perform the duties under the direction of the governor of the Panama Canal Zone and that Col. Goethals, now governor of the Panama Canal, shall be chairman of the committee. I was under the impression that the gentleman from Massachusetts was familiar with the correspondence, which is official, although he may not have understood entirely the purpose of the communication.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not remember seeing the letter. I am not saying that I did not, because my memory is uncertain about such matters. My recollection, however, is as I first stated, that I did not.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if I understood him correctly in saying that this letter was a part of the official files of the committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I know to what the gentleman refers——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the President violates the rules of the House continually.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The President is not bound by the rules of the House.

Mr. MANN. The President and members of the Cabinet have recently got in the habit of writing official letters addressed to chairmen of committees expressing official wishes. All of them know the practice and rules of the House. Rule XLI of the House provides:

Estimates of appropriations and all other communications from the executive departments, intended for the consideration of any committees of the House, shall be addressed to the Speaker, and by him referred as provided by clause 2 of Rule XXIV.

If the President had complied with this rule, of which he is cognizant, there would be no question about its having come to the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because it would be printed and all Members of the House would have cognizance of it. These secret official communications which the President and members of the Cabinet are now engaged in sending to chairmen of committees are one of the greatest abuses that can possibly take place in a representative form of government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I think I have notified more members of the Cabinet and heads of bureaus than has any other Member of this House that communications addressed to me are for my personal use, and that if they desired to have them considered as official communications and for the use of the committee they should comply with the rule to which the gentleman has referred and address them to the Speaker. I have done so frequently during this session and during previous sessions, and the result has been that the formal communications have been sent. The letter addressed to me by the President reached me after the urgent deficiency bill had left the House. If it had come before the bill had passed the House, I would have suggested to the President the propriety of sending a message to Congress. I did inform him that as the matter had passed beyond the jurisdiction of the House it would be necessary, in order to have any action taken, that it should be taken up with the Senate. I do not recall in just what way it was taken up, whether formally or informally, but my impression is that the President addressed a communication to the chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

At the beginning of this Congress I sent to all members of the Cabinet a little manual, which contained certain laws with respect to estimates and appropriations and the rules of the House particularly applicable to the members of the Cabinet, and requested them to familiarize themselves with them and observe them. I hope at least that this discussion will have the effect of making members of the Cabinet a little more particular about the observance of this particular rule. Its object is to make public the communications between the executive departments and Congress. If they are sent to the Speaker, they are printed and properly referred. I have never given very much consideration to communications, either in this administration or previous ones, addressed to me personally, other than those from the Chief Executive, and I do not propose to do so in the future. The rule is an important one, in the interest of the public, the proper transaction of public business, and it should be observed. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no criticism of the gentleman from New York. I know his views would be very similar to mine. But I called attention to this because within a few days it came to my notice, as it would and will to the notice of other Members, that the Secretary of War, for whom I have the highest regard, wrote a letter to the President asking him to write a letter to the chairman of one of the committees urging the committee to make a favorable report of a claims bill, which the President did. It was not sent to the Speaker, as it should have been, so that Members of the House could have it.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that so much time has been taken on this little incident. I simply took it up as an illustration of the economy which the Democratic Party is professing as their guiding motive.

Mr. GARNER. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to yield there. I think the gentleman's criticism is very unjust, considering the fact that the leader of his own party agreed to this arrangement. After the leader of the party agreed to it, it ought not to lie in the mouth of the gentleman from Massachusetts to criticize it.

Mr. MANN. You can criticize me; I am perfectly willing.

Mr. GILLETT. What the gentleman from Illinois stated was unknown to me. While the gentleman from Texas is possibly correct, that it takes away the charge of extravagance, it certainly adds another charge, which I think is much graver, and that is to accomplish a proper action in connection with the Canal Zone certain arrangements of patronage had to be made, which is not creditable to the administration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know anything about the secret intrigues of the gentleman from Illinois. I had no knowledge of them, had nothing to do with them, and I am not bound by them, and I will not be by any in which he may engage in the future.

Mr. GILLETT. I wish it to be distinctly understood by the gentleman from Nebraska, as well as others, that I mean no criticism on Mr. Metcalfe, for whom the office was made. My criticism is solely on the administration and upon its failure to carry out the profession.

Here is another illustration that came to my attention, and I am shocked to find how much time has been consumed; but Members will bear me witness that I have not used all of it or been wholly to blame——

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTON. Might we not criticize the administration for not prosecuting more vigorously the charges in the commissary department at Panama? There is an indictment pending, but not much prosecution going on.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think if the gentleman knew anything about it he would not make the statement that this administration or any other administration is subject to any criticism. I do not know whether the man is innocent or guilty, but an employee of the commissary department is under indictment.

Mr. MADDEN. Let him be tried, and that will settle it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think he ought to be given a chance to be tried without anyone making a statement that any administration should be criticized because he has not been prosecuted.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to explain, if he will, what he meant by saying that his criticism was directed mainly to the fact that the professions of the party had not been lived up to.

Mr. GILLETT. I have already alluded to that. There is one other incident, Mr. Chairman, to which I desire to refer, which has come to my attention. On March 3, 1913, an act was passed which originated in the Senate and which designated to perform the duty of special resident commissioner of the Lincoln Memorial Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, who was to receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 a year. That was approved March 3, 1913. That bill was passed, as those who are here will remember, because Mr. Cullom, after an unusually long and useful and distinguished service, was leaving the Senate, and was supposed to be absolutely without means of support. I think it was generally understood that this was a sinecure, to give him $5,000 a year for the few remaining months which he obviously had to live, for he then seemed to be trembling upon the brink of the grave. The act originated in the Senate. It came over here and was passed. Whether it was justifiable or not I shall not undertake to say. It was done, at any rate, for a venerable man who was just finishing an eminent career in the Senate, who was on the edge of the grave, and who was supposed to be penniless.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman know that the estate of Mr. Cullom inventoried approximately $100,000?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes; I do know it, and was as much astonished as everyone else; but it was supposed at the time that he was without means, otherwise I do not think the act would ever have passed. I think all of us were very much surprised to find that he had saved a handsome estate. In less than a year Mr. Cullom died. The sinecure ended. But this Democratic Party, that is pledged to abolish useless offices—and that this office is useful I think few will contend, because the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds is the agent of the Lincoln Memorial here in the city, and there is no necessity for another official—this Democratic Party, pledged to economy and to the abolishment of useless offices, instantly revived the same bill, inserting, however, the name of Hon. Joseph C. S. Blackburn instead of that of Mr. Cullom. I have great admiration and regard for Mr. Blackburn. He also has done good service for his country. He is not and he was not at the time emerging from the Senate or from Government service. As to his pecuniary condition I have nothing to say. I am not upholding the bill which originally made the appointment. I am only saying that I should suppose the party whose banner and watchword was economy and the abolition of useless offices would have seized this opportunity to drop that office and not instantly revive it and put a new incumbent in the place.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman really believe that this is an entirely unnecessary office?

Mr. GILLETT. I believe so.

Mr. GARNER. And that this bill ought not to have passed?

Mr. GILLETT. I believe so.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman know that this bill passed the House by unanimous consent?

Mr. GILLETT. I did not know it passed at all until it was called to my attention.

Mr. GARNER. It was passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. GILLETT. Very well. I do not see what that has to do with it.

Mr. GARNER. I simply want to call to his attention the fact that any gentleman might have prevented it by saying no.

Mr. GILLETT. Oh, the majority is responsible for it, and you can not evade responsibility for the act in that way.

Mr. GARNER. I am not trying to evade responsibility; but the gentleman or any other gentleman in the House could have stopped it by objecting.

Mr. MANN. As I understand it, the gentleman from Texas contends that it is the duty of the gentleman from Massachusetts to force the Democrats to observe their platform?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Texas contends this, that where a gentleman sits on the floor of the House and permits a bill to become a law, he ought to be estopped thereafter from criticizing that law.

Mr. MANN. He did not sit on the floor of the House. The gentleman knows how it was passed. There were not 20 Members here when the bill was passed.

Mr. GILLETT. We are not all of us here when unanimous-consent bills are passed, and the gentleman knows that.

Mr. MANN. It was not passed on unanimous-consent day.

Mr. GARNER. That is true.

Mr. GILLETT. Just one further allusion to a matter which I discussed some weeks ago, and I am done. I refer now to the waiver by the President of the civil-service rules for the appointment of the Rev. Glazebrooke to be consul at Jerusalem. I referred to that some weeks ago in some remarks in the House, and I showed, as it seemed to me then, that it was a contradiction of the President's professed purposes. I have waited, hoping that some one would explain why it was necessary to waive that requirement.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I know the gentleman who was appointed consul to Jerusalem, and I consider he is preeminently qualified by his experience and training to fill that post.

Mr. GILLETT. Experience and training in what?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. In the line of knowledge and intelligence and in adaptability for the difficult duties of the position.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, is not Jerusalem an extraterritorial place and does it not require a lawyer?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly. Is the Rev. Glazebrooke versed in the law?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. He is not; but I presume his general knowledge of the law and the duties of the consulship at Jerusalem would more than offset any specialist in legal acumen.

Mr. GILLETT. He has been a clergyman all of his life, has he not?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I presume he is. I think if there is any one office in the United States Consular Service that would require the services of a clergyman the consulship at Jerusalem is that particular office.

Mr. GILLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is just where I differ with the gentleman. The President last summer said such an appointment would be an exception to the rule and would be made only when the convenience and good of the service clearly required such an exception. I have been waiting to ascertain why the good of the service required that exception. The gentleman says that he thinks he is eminently qualified as a clergyman to be appointed consul at Jerusalem. Does Jerusalem require a clergyman? In the first place, the consul at Jerusalem has extraterritorial jurisdiction and he has to sit as a judge. I do not know why the life of a clergyman gives a man the training and experience to which the gentleman refers as qualifying him. The gentleman would be wiser to take the attitude of the Secretary of State, that experience is not a qualification. The fact that the gentleman is a clergyman, to my mind, peculiarly disqualifies him from the post at Jerusalem. It undoubtedly makes Jerusalem more attractive to him, but we have tried that before. We have had a consul before at Jerusalem, very learned in oriental lore, and our experience with that consul was such as to make us believe we ought never to repeat it. The fact is, Jerusalem, more than almost any other place on the globe, is a place of religious dissension, where religious feeling is intense, and affects the life of the place. Why, Kingsley, if I am not mistaken, in his history of the Crimean War, said that one of the main causes of that war was a contest among the sects at Jerusalem as to displaying an emblem on the walls of the chapel. In Jerusalem, of all places, we do not want to be represented by a person who is a clergyman and will at once excite sectarian feeling.

It seems to me no reason at all has been given why the rule which the President approved and said he should enforce, of appointing as our consuls young, active, virile men who are acquainted with and would promote the business interests of the United States, should be broken by the appointment at Jerusalem of a clergyman 69 years old and who could not pass the regular examinations. The consul may be all the gentleman from Colorado states. I have no doubt he is an estimable and cultured man, but we do not want our Consular Service to become a sanitarium for venerable clergymen or a retreat for broken-down politicians. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I would like to say to the gentleman that I do not wish to take up the gentleman's time in endeavoring to refute the gentleman's argument——

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman can do that in his own time.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. But I would be very glad at some time to take a counter position to that occupied by the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman can undoubtedly procure time; and I wish very much he would state why the convenience and good of the service required this appointment, as the President stated. Now, I wish to apologize to the committee for taking so much time; but you will bear witness that it was not my fault entirely that I have been much longer than I intended. I simply wished, in performing a function which I think devolved upon the minority of the committee, to call attention to some of these specific instances as specimens how the conduct of the Democratic administration squares with its professions and its platform. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman use some time?

Mr. GILLETT. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think I shall use the hour which has been yielded to me; but I desire to make a few observations in regard to the bill which we are about to consider. The sundry civil appropriation bill, more than any other appropriation bill coming before the House, relates to or affects every part of the governmental service. It contains items making provision for almost every class of governmental activities. Taking that into consideration, this is a very remarkable bill. We are increasing in population in this country at the rate of about 2,000,000 per annum. We are widening and broadening and extending our governmental activities even more rapidly than we are increasing in population; and yet this bill, having to do with nearly every department of the Government service, is the smallest bill, as it stands now, of any sundry civil appropriation bill in nine years. We all know that in that period of time we have widely extended our governmental activities. We all know in that period of time we have increased our population very greatly, and under ordinary conditions of legislation the sundry civil appropriation bill should increase somewhat year by year; and yet this bill as reported not only carries less than the sundry civil appropriations for the last eight years, but very much less. It carries approximately $107,000,000 as against $124,000,000 carried in the sundry civil and deficiency appropriations in 1914. We must go back to 1906 to find a sundry civil appropriation bill in which the expenditures were anything like as small as the amount carried in this bill.

This bill as reported compared with sundry civil and deficiency appropriations under the same heads for the 10-year period are as follows:

Total in this bill	$107,696,759.28
1914	124,689,948.87
1913	118,126,982.96
1912	142,638,044.14
1911	115,158,726.82
1910	138,020,927.76
1909	124,465,338.23
1907	111,146,884.65

There is a reduction in the bill as reported of something like $17,000,000 below the estimates. The administration is undoubtedly laboring earnestly to keep the appropriations down; therefore the estimates were, no doubt, all considered essential. I am willing to give the administration credit for attempting to keep the party pledges touching economy. That being the case, the estimates were not excessive, and when the committee makes a cut of $17,000,000 in one bill below the estimates it may be assumed that the committee is doing some considerably, heavy trimming. And yet I want to say this in justice to the committee—to the chairman of the committee particularly, for he is very largely entitled to whatever credit or whatever discredit there may be in the size or character of the appropriations carried in the bill—while the reductions have been very great, they have not been made recklessly or carelessly or without due regard to the public service. As a matter of fact, under the management of the able chairman of the committee, much as the estimates have been pruned, much as the bill has been reduced, I am of the opinion that with a comparatively few exceptions there is no branch of the Government service that would seriously suffer in its present activities if this bill were not greatly increased over the amount which it now carries when it becomes a law. Of course we all know that the bill will be very greatly increased. We all know that when the bill, pruned as it has been far below the estimates—which in themselves, we must admit, were not high—reaches another body there will be great additions made to it, and then we shall have a real test of whether our Democratic friends are sincere, so far as these expenditures are concerned, in the matter of their protestations of economy.

We shall again have the fact illustrated that this is a growing and developing country, and that, talk as much as you will about economy, Government expenditures will grow unless you refuse to provide for proper growth and extension of governmental activities. I do not want to be misunderstood in what I have said relative to the character of the bill. I have said that there are comparatively few public services and activities that would be seriously unfavorably affected if the items of the bill were not greatly increased. The fact remains, however, that the bill, pruned as it is, necessarily fails to provide for the proper growth and extension of Government service, fails to provide for many things which, while we may be able to get along without, should be provided for.

In making up this bill the committee did what some committees in Republican Congresses have done, to a certain extent, that is, appropriate for nine months instead of for a year, and that fact explains to a very considerable extent the reduction of the bill below estimates, which are lower than our expenditures for similar purposes for a number of years past. I think the committee has fallen into this error of appropriating for only part of the year, this sharp practice, more than is justifiable. While it is not entirely essential that an appropriation bill presumed to care for certain public services for a year shall contain sufficient amounts to care for all services for 12 months, it certainly is better practice, fairer practice, more honest practice, to have the bill carry the necessary sums for the entire year rather than in many lines only enough to care for those services for eight or nine months. The expectation is that in the following bill, passed after the elections are over, amounts carried will be increased over what would otherwise be necessary, sufficient to make up for the deficiencies and shortcomings of the bill.

The public-building items illustrate this practice better perhaps than any other items contained in the bill. The public-building service will not suffer, because we only appropriate up to the 4th of March next, or a sum sufficient to care for public buildings up to the 4th of March next; still it would be very much more honest if the bill carried the entire amount which will be necessary for the entire year it is supposed to cover.

There are one or two items which are very considerably decreased by reason of changed conditions or views since the first estimates were made. There is a considerable reduction in the appropriations for the Panama Canal, but I believe the committee has given enough to carry on the work on the canal in a satisfactory way to completion. There is also a considerable decrease in the items for fortifications on the Panama Canal, due to the fact that it has been deemed wise to utilize as far as practicable the buildings we already have on the Canal Zone, rather than to erect new buildings for the housing of our troops. Whatever may have occurred elsewhere, whatever others may have done in disregard of the declarations of the Democratic Party in various matters, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has endeavored to keep faith in the matter of economy, and if his colleagues will stand by him, there is still some hope that they will not create so large a deficit through their appropriations for the coming fiscal year as has seemed inevitable heretofore.

And let it be remembered that it is up to the majority to practice economy, for of a free balance in the general fund of the Treasury, left by the late outgoing Republican administration, of over $150,000,000 there remains less than $74,000,000. Unless our Democratic friends are more lucky in the future in the matter of revenue and more careful in the future in the matter of expenditures than they have been up to this time, we will soon reach the period when it will be necessary to resort to the characteristic Democratic method of raising revenue through the issuance of bonds. Personally I shall be somewhat surprised if the administration does not find it absolutely essential to issue bonds before the first half of the coming fiscal year has passed. I have no doubt but that an earnest effort will be made to get beyond the November elections without resorting to this method of raising revenues. Possibly nothing further will be done than to have the plates ready and everything in preparation, waiting until after the ides of November to make the issue. Every fact and indication at the present time of revenues and expenditures points straight in the direction of such a deficit as will render a bond issue necessary in the no-distant future. In view of these facts, well known and appreciated by the chairman and all the members of the Appropriations Committee, it is not to be wondered at that this great bill has been so trimmed, scaled, and reduced. I again congratulate the chairman and the members of the committee that in the sweeping reductions deemed necessary in view of the situation they have not done more harm than they have. I want to say for the chairman that he and the other members of the subcommittee made an earnest effort to care for the public service so far as that could be done and keep this bill down to the very lowest penny. The majority members of that committee realize the situation that confronts us of increased cost of running the Government and reduced receipts. They realize business conditions in the country are such as to accentuate this situation in the future, and that unless there shall be a very radical change in affairs in the near future progression toward a deficit will be very rapidly accelerated.

Let us see what the business condition of the country is as indicated by our foreign trade. I happened to pick up this morning the advance statement of the Department of Commerce relative to exports and imports for the month of April, 1914, as compared with the exports and imports for the same month in 1913. I find that there was an increase of imports in April, 1914, over April, 1913, of $27,702,015; and the alarming thing about that increase of imports is that it is especially large in finished manufactures ready for consumption. There was an increase of imports in crude materials for use in manufacturing from approximately fifty-two to approximately sixty-five million dollars; in foodstuffs, crude, from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000, in round numbers; in foodstuffs, partly or wholly manufactured, from $18,000,000 to $25,000,000.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. DIES. Does the gentleman think that the increase of imports has had a tendency to increase the high cost of living?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry to have to say, because I naturally regret anything that does not carry out the hopes and claims of the gentleman's party, that I have seen no evidences of any reduction in the cost of living.

Up to this time the only articles, so far as I know, that have been decreased in price are golf balls and automobile tires. I do not play golf. [Laughter.] Otherwise the cost of living has steadily increased.

Mr. DIES. The injury that the gentleman speaks of results in what?

Mr. MONDELL. What injury?

Mr. DIES. I suppose the gentleman's speech is a lamentation. That is what we have had from gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Mr. MONDELL. No; not a lamentation, but a statement of facts. But it happens that under Democratic administrations a statement of facts is necessarily a lamentation, because it shows an unfortunate condition of affairs. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DIES. Who is the injured party in that particular case?

Mr. MONDELL. I will try to enlighten the gentleman before I get through. I am calling attention to the fact that we are importing increased quantities of goods, and I do not need to explain to so intelligent a gentleman as the gentleman from Texas the truth of what Abraham Lincoln once said—that if you buy an article at home you have at home the money and the article, but if you buy an article abroad you have at home the article and the foreigner has your cash.

Mr. DIES. Precisely; and the gentleman has given us the imports for April. Will you give us the exports for the same month as compared with that month of last year?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman had listened to me he would know I was comparing the various items of imports. I shall come to exports later. Possibly the gentleman has not been listening. I said a moment ago that of foodstuffs, for instance, in crude condition and food animals we imported in April, 1913, to be accurate, $15,991,013; in April, 1914, $20,414,438, an increase of almost four and one-half millions.

Mr. DIES. Now, to make those statistics valuable, does not the gentleman think that the exports for the corresponding month should be given?

Mr. MONDELL. I will give them if the gentleman will only give me an opportunity.

Mr. DIES. I will, with pleasure and patience.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, coming to manufactures ready for consumption, we imported in April, 1913, $28,937,438 worth; in April, 1914, $34,082,964 worth, or an increase in that month over the corresponding month of the year before of finished products ready for consumption of over $5,000,000.

Now, I do not know—perhaps some gentleman who has studied that matter more than I have can tell me—I do not know just what is the estimate of the average daily production of a man in the industries. You might say that his average wage in the United States would probably be in the vicinity of $2 50 or $3 a day. I do not know what his production would be, but it is entirely conservative to say that the increased importations of finished products in April, 1914, over April, 1913, probably means the loss of about half a million days' work to American citizens. Now, if the gentleman thinks that is a good thing, he is welcome to that view.

Mr. DIES. How does my friend reconcile his statement without giving to the House the benefit of the exportations of that month? If we are exporting more than we are importing for the corresponding month——

Mr. MANN. I will state to the gentleman that we are exporting less, and we shall give him the figures later.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I will give him that information if he is patient; and when he hears the figures he will not be happy over them, unless he takes a different view of things than I think he does.

Now, how about these exports? How about this foreign market that we were to find under the New Freedom? How about the ports of the earth that were to throw wide open their gates and invite us in with our cargoes of crude and manufactured articles under the new dispensation? How is that working out?

I want to remind the gentleman that these are figures. They are not "psychological" propositions. [Laughter on the Republican side.] They are matters of dollars and cents in trade, and they are not something that resides only in somebody's imagination. In the month of April in the year 1913 we exported of crude materials for use in manufacturing $47,556,871 worth, and in the unfortunate April that has just passed, under the dispensation of the party to which my friend from Texas belongs, we exported just a little more than $10,000,000 less; or, to be accurate, we exported $37,627,006 worth—$10,000,000 f loss in one class of exports. How long will it take us to lose all our foreign trade at that rate? The gentleman can figure it out.

Of foodstuffs in crude condition and food animals we exported in April, 1913, $13,209,610; in 1914, the April just passed, we exported $6,738,021. We lost more than half of our export trade last April, as compared with the export trade of the April before, in foodstuffs in crude condition and food animals—the sort of things that the farmers export. Of foodstuffs partly or wholly manufactured we exported in April, 1913, in round numbers, $26,000,000; in April, 1914, in round figures, $19,000,000—a loss of $6,000,000 in foodstuffs partly or wholly manufactured. Thus we are conquering the markets of the world under the New Freedom. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DIES. Does my friend think that they will not take our goods because we have taken theirs? Is that his position?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not feel called upon to furnish any hypothesis as to the whys and wherefores of this proposition of foreign trade, other than to say that the Democratic proposition that you have to import largely in order to get a market for your exports has been proven fallacious beyond the power of words to express, and every time we have tried it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas just asked the gentleman from Wyoming if foreigners had not refused to take our goods because we had refused to take theirs.

Mr. MONDELL. Is that what he asked? I did not quite understand it.

Mr. MANN. That is the simple question he asked. I do not mean "simple" because easily understood, but because it could come only from a simple mind, after hearing your statement that we had increased our imports.

Mr. MONDELL. If that is the question, it is so simple that there is no difficulty, of course, in answering it. The facts speak for themselves.

Mr. DIES. No. I think the gentleman from Wyoming would get a better sense of what my question was than by listening to the gentleman from Illinois. My question was this: Do they refuse to take our exports because we have taken their imports?

Mr. MONDELL. The fact is they have not taken our exports, the prophecies of the gentleman's party and its advocates to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. FESS. I understood you to say that our loss was $10,000,000.

Mr. MONDELL. On one class of articles.

Mr. FESS. Ah! A year ago the balance of trade in our favor was nearly $54,000,000, and this year in April the balance was something like $10,000,000 against us, which would make something like $64,000,000 of loss.

Mr. MONDELL. I am afraid I did not make myself entirely clear. I said that we had lost $10,000,000 in exports in April, 1914, compared with April, 1913, in one class of articles.

Mr. FESS. I did not understand that.

Mr. MONDELL. Crude materials for use in manufacturing.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman give the whole sum of the loss?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I will do that if the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Texas will be patient with me.

Mr. FESS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I think there are other Members here who would like to have those figures.

Mr. DIES. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but if I gather his philosophy it is this: A decrease of exports, an influx of imports, and the high cost of living remaining stationary.

Mr. MANN. It is going up.

Mr. MONDELL. A loss of trade abroad, a loss of employment at home, nobody benefited, and millions of men out of employment. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the situation.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. What is the gentleman going to say as to the prophecy about wool, while he is talking about prophecies?

Mr. MONDELL. I was coming to that, if the gentleman will be good enough. I pointed out wool went to its lowest point when the Democratic Party got in a position to threaten to put wool on the free list. There was a slight increase immediately thereafter, to be followed—as every wool buyer at a meeting before the Department of Agriculture the other day agreed—by a still lower price next year than we had two years ago.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. In other words, we are still in the realm of prophecy as to what will happen next year.

Mr. MONDELL. But the prophecies came true. The price a year ago was some 5 or 6 cents less per pound in my country than we had the year before under a protective tariff. And our people have not forgotten that even though the reaction has brought the price up a cent or two since. This is what we are not forgetting. We are still getting several cents a pound less than we generally got under a protective tariff. Meanwhile no one, including the gentleman from Texas, has heard of anybody buying woolen goods any cheaper. The promise of lower cost of living has not been fulfilled.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. SLOAN. In view of the question of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL], when the gentleman from Wyoming discusses the wool question will he also discuss the Angora goat-hair question?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes. Of course, in Texas they cultivate the goat more than they do the sheep; and the Democratic Party carrying out its policy of playing favorites in its legislation and contrary to the Scripture proposition as to the division of these creatures—the Democratic Party has selected the goat for its favor, while the gentle sheep has fallen under the ban, and the industry is steadily decreasing.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I will say to the gentleman that that may be on the theory that we have gotten the Republican Party's goat. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Not for long, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman from Wyoming still recognizes that the country at large is still keeping the sheep on the right-hand side, does he not?

Mr. MONDELL. The country at large will ultimately put the sheep on the right-hand side. Not that we wish to do the goat any injury, but eventually we will also recognize the good qualities of the sheep and the tremendous importance of having the sheep industry prosper.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted I was calling attention to the tremendous loss in exports.

In the matter of manufactures ready for consumption we exported during April, 1913, in round numbers, $70,000,000; in the month of April, 1914, we exported of the same articles $62,000,000, a trade loss in that one class of articles of over $8,000,000.

The total decrease of exports in April, 1914, below April, 1913, was $37,266,403, a loss of thirty-seven and a quarter million dollars of foreign trade in April, as compared with the corresponding month of the year before, under a bill that, according to its proponents, advocates, and defenders, was to open to us the markets of the world.

Taking those two items, exports and imports, for April, 1914, as compared with April, 1913, and adding together the increase of imports and the loss of exports, to show how the balance of trade is shifting against us, we find an unfavorable trade movement in that one month amounting to $64,968,418. Now, honor bright, I ask the gentlemen on the other side if anyone on this side of the House criticizing your tariff bill and prophesying, as you say, as to what would occur under it, made a prophecy at any time which would compare as a condemnation of Democratic policy with these cold, hard facts of conditions under your tariff legislation?

What does it mean? Why, it means that this loss of trade on the one hand and this increase of importations on the other, going on as it is constantly, increasing in volume and percentage almost in a geometrical ratio, will, if it is continued, paralyze the trade of the country within another 12 months. You can not have that sort of a condition of constantly increasing imports and decreasing exports go on for a year without bringing on a panic, because that means the closing of mills and factories, the shutting down of industry. It means millions of idle men. It means want and misery.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield.

Mr. FESS. If this process continues, what effect will it have upon the supply of gold that is required in the settlement of international balances?

Mr. MONDELL. No one understands that better than the gentleman who has just spoken. It means a constant and continuous drain, and a drain that in the course of time is likely to place us in the position that we were in under the last Democratic administration, where we had to issue bonds in order to buy gold to keep up the gold reserve.

Did I understand the gentleman from Texas to say that he was not sure about my figures?

Mr. DIES. I think I am sure about them. I feel that I am.

Mr. MONDELL. I am reading from a statement that I received from the Department of Commerce this morning, a statement they made for general circulation.

It is as follows:

Mr. DIES. I feel sure that if the gentleman uses figures to show that exports are decreasing and imports are increasing and the high cost of living is remaining stationary, his figures will be received with a degree of allowance by every sane person, whether he is in the gallery or on the floor.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if the gentleman will let me proceed——

Mr. DIES. It is a wonder how exports can decrease and imports increase and the cost of living remain the same and nobody gets the benefit of it.

Mr. MANN. The foreigner gets the benefit of it.

Mr. MONDELL. How can anybody on this side of the water get the benefit of it? I will tell you gentlemen where we will find those who get the benefit of it. Let the gentleman visit Manchester or Birmingham or Hamburg or any of the manufacturing centers of the world outside of our borders and he will find who is getting the benefit of it.

Mr. DIES. They are getting less from us, getting a bigger price for their goods, and imports are increasing here, and the cost of living is remaining stationary. Wonderful, wonderful!

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the gentleman from Texas can make his visionary, Democratic argument in his own time. I am stating facts. The gentleman, like our beloved President, may, if he can, get his people to agree with him, resolve all these facts on the hypothesis of psychology. He may get his people down in the back districts of Texas to believe that bad business and hard times is all psychological. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DIES. I voted against free wool and free lumber, but how both the buyer and the seller can become bankrupt in the same transaction I can not see.

Mr. MONDELL. That is one peculiar thing in a Democratic administration—we get hit coming and going. Nobody has been able yet to understand anything about it except that it is a fact. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Facts are facts to me, and they prove themselves. I do not find it necessary to analyze them.

I am telling you, gentlemen, just what the situation is. There is no reduction but rather an increase in the cost of living. The situation is just what we said it would be. It is just what I said it would be, it is just what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said it would be, just what the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said it would be, just what the gentlemen from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and Ohio [Mr. FESS], and all of us on this side said it would be. Judging from what has occurred heretofore under the Democratic policies applying to your proposition the ordinary rules of logic, we said that if you legislated as you insisted on legislating you would close our factories, deprive our people of employment, open the factories abroad, and flood the country with foreign goods. We said that you would not benefit anyone on this side of the water, but that you would bring disaster to millions. It is all coming even faster than we anticipated.

Mr. DIES. In other words if I understand the gentleman, the sellers are getting less for their goods and the buyers are paying more.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman understands how merchants are buying foreign goods, and I suppose cheaper goods than the same kind of American goods, and still selling them for the same price, well and good. What interests me is the fact that they are doing it, for no one even claims to be buying goods any cheaper.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman from Wyoming would vote to reenact the Payne tariff law, would he?

Mr. MONDELL. I would vote to-day with great enthusiasm to write on the statute books of the Nation a good, sound protective tariff bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DIES. Precisely.

Mr. MONDELL. And about 9 people out of 10 in the country would be mighty glad to give us a chance to do it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DIES. Would the gentleman vote now, as he voted in 1909, for the Payne bill; would he do it again if he had it to do over again?

Mr. MONDELL. I vote for the best legislation for the time and conditions.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Texas, like all Democrats, is four or five years behind the times.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman said he did not like his own tariff bill, but the trouble with the gentleman was that he thought there were a lot of good things in it and some bad things in it. The fact is there was not anything good in it.

Mr. ADAIR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. The gentleman's State is a large wool-producing State and the price has increased 3 or 4 cents a pound under the Underwood tariff bill. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is working a hardship on the farmers of his State?

Mr. MONDELL. The trouble is that the gentleman from Indiana does not state the fact. Wool has not increased 3 or 4 cents a pound under the Underwood tariff bill.

Mr. ADAIR. How much has it?

Mr. MONDELL. Wool has not increased in price at all under the Underwood tariff bill.

Mr. ADAIR. It is selling for more money now than it was.

Mr. MONDELL. A cent or two more than last year at this time. Last year's wool clip was sold before the Underwood bill became a law.

Mr. ADAIR. Well, whether 1 cent or 2, it is 3 or 4 cents in my State; has that increase worked a hardship on the farmers of his State?

Mr. MONDELL. If that is all the gentleman from Indiana has left to carry him through the coming campaign, the gentleman will be left out in the cold. Now, Mr. Chairman, a little later I propose to discuss this entire wool and woolen situation. And when I do, I think I can convince even the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR], biased as I fear he is, that the wool industry has suffered frightfully under the Underwood tariff bill, and will continue to suffer as long as that law remains on the statute books.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman says that wool is selling for more money now than it did a year ago?

Mr. MONDELL. A little.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Underwood tariff bill has not been a law for a year. Then the gentleman says that wool has not increased under the Underwood tariff law.

Mr. MONDELL. It has not increased by reason of the Underwood tariff bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman did not say that. He said it had not increased under it. Wool is selling for more now than it did a year ago. The Underwood tariff bill has not been in effect for a year, and therefore, according to the gentleman's statement, wool is not bringing more under the Underwood tariff bill. Is not that the ordinary Republican standpat logic?

Mr. MANN. How much money has the Treasury lost on the importations?

Mr. MONDELL. Fifteen millions.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Wyoming is able to make his speech. Mr. Chairman, without any help from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Or the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Although the gentleman from Illinois may imagine that nobody on that side can make a speech without his assistance, and I insist that the gentleman from Wyoming has just given a very valuable illustration——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, who is making this speech? [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. A very valuable illustration of the character of logic believed in and adopted and pursued by the standpat Republicans that although something is bringing in more money now than it did a year ago, and although since that time a law was enacted, that those prices are not brought under that law.

Mr. MANN. And the gentleman from New York is guilty of the lack of logic that permeates all Democratic legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I intend to discuss this whole matter a little later, and that I do not intend to allow the Democratic side to consume my entire hour by riveting attention to the one glimmer of hope on the whole gloomy Democratic horizon, I am going to make just one brief statement

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I will give the gentleman another hour if he will make that kind of a speech.

Mr. MONDELL. As everybody who knows anything about wool knows, wool went to or below the foreign price as soon as you gentlemen had declared your intention to put it on the free list, in advance of the passage of the Underwood bill, as it did in advance of the Wilson bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, they were trying to scare Congress.

Mr. MONDELL. And as it always will in advance of any tariff reduction.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is not that an attempt to frighten Congress not to do what it desires to do? Is not that the old trick of these highly protected Republicans?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I suppose the gentleman imagines that the woolgrowers out in my State sell their wool at a low price and lose money on it just for fun and with the idea that they are going to influence Congress by so doing. That is the kind of argument that the gentleman from New York now advances, and it is hardly worthy of him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was it not a notorious fact that for the purpose of coercing and influencing Congress in that way, a large steel plant did stop operations in the district of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and did he not denounce that attempt to coerce and influence his action in this House when the steel schedule was under consideration?

Mr. MANN. And I suppose that is the reason that so many of them have stopped since.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Was not that an illustration of what these chaps, who have fattened and grown rich under Republican tariff, had been doing for years every time any attempt was made to give relief to the people? Have they not always tried to frighten Congress by saying that the bottom would fall out of prices? I see my colleague from New York [Mr. PAYNE] laughs. No wonder he laughs, for he understands it.

Mr. PAYNE. I think that kind of stuff might go down with the gentleman's constituents——

Mr. FITZGERALD. He now appreciates the joke for the first time in his life.

Mr. PAYNE. I think that kind of stuff might go down with the gentleman's constituents, but he could not go where people are intelligent and make them believe it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, if I made a speech in the gentleman's district, it would go Democratic, and he ought to thank me for not coming into it.

Mr. PAYNE. My majority would be double what it is now if the gentleman came up and made a speech. Come up and I will pay your expenses.

Mr. ADAIR rose.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I feel that I can not yield further.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman hardly gives me a square deal.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield in just a moment, after I have taken care of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has referred to some alleged happenings in the district of the gentleman from Alabama that I do not recall, but I do happen to have noticed that the industries down there in the district of the gentleman from Alabama are now protesting and wailing and rending the firmament. They say that the foreign producer of steel can lay down steel in Mobile for very much less than they can make it, and that the foreign steel men are invading their markets.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, before we close I just want to get into the RECORD the fact that nine out of eleven farm products have been higher in price since the Underwood bill passed than before.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR], having, without observing the rule, interjected their various observations, allegations, and imaginings into my speech, I trust I may now be allowed to say a few words myself. It will be observed that none of the gentlemen on the Democratic side who have interrupted me have attempted to question the facts I have presented as to the lamentable condition of the Nation's finances, its trade, and its industries. They pursue the ordinary Democratic method of confession and avoidance. They abused us for alleged extravagance, and promised economy, yet the sum total of their appropriations will be greater than under Republican administrations. They assured the people improved conditions of trade and employment and a lower cost of living. Trade and industry is paralyzed, employment is lacking, and they themselves confess that the cost of living has not been reduced—they even make a virtue of the claim that it is increased.

The fact is that things have come out just as we said they would under their policies, and even more unfortunately and rapidly than we had predicted. They have not a rag or a thread of argument left to hang to, and in their desperation they are adopting their customary tactics of each making the kind of argument which he hopes will save him in his particular district. They put wool on the free list not because the majority of them wanted to, but because the President told them they must to make wool and woolens cheaper. Their threat did make wool cheaper with a vengeance, and caused the American woolgrower a loss in last year's clip of many millions of dollars. Wool having quite naturally, slightly, and temporarily recovered from the lowest price of last year, they take that as a justification for a free-wool policy which they were driven to adopt, ignoring the fact that the wool industry is in a condition of depression, that the Government has lost many millions in revenue, and that no one has bought woolen goods any cheaper.

It ought not to have required the experience we are having to prove the fallacy of Democratic arguments and the incapacity of the Democratic Party to wisely legislate in the interest of the people of the country. In fact, it did not require this further experience under Democratic policies to enlighten the people as to their disastrous consequences, but it has required this experience to convince Republicans that in settling their differences and disagreements they make an awful mistake when they carry them to a length that gives the Democratic minority a lease of power such as it now has. This lesson has, in my opinion, been brought home to Republicans with convincing emphasis, and the result will be that while there may still continue for a time some differences of view, mostly on nonessentials, among our people, the great majority of those who have believed in protection, who approve sane principles and methods of government, who want to be relieved and relieve the country from present unfavorable and unfortunate conditions, will unite in the coming election in the support of Republican candidates. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I did not propose to become involved in this debate, and I only rose for the purpose of saying to the gentleman from Wyoming that I sincerely hope that he will print in the RECORD the information which he has just stated in reference to the district which I have the honor to represent. There has been a dull iron market and comparatively low prices for iron, but not nearly as low as I have seen them under Republican administration and under a Republican tariff bill. The lowest price that I have heard of pig iron selling in the Birmingham district in the last few months has been about $10 to $10.50 a ton, and I can recall a time when, under the Dingley bill, before the Spanish War, pig iron was selling in the Birmingham district at from $7 to $8 a ton, and they were glad to get it. Those conditions are brought about by general world conditions and conditions in the country——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to a fact which I read in the papers this morning, which stated that there had been very large sales of pig iron in the Birmingham district at about $10.50 a ton just recently, and that there had been large shipments of pig iron to Italy and to Australia, and some to England, from the Birmingham (Ala.) district within the last 30 days. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If somebody has assumed that pig iron has been landed at Mobile cheaper than they could make it in Birmingham, that gentleman was working entirely on his imagination, because I will say to the gentleman this, that if I were a wagering man I would wager that you can not find where a ton of pig iron has been landed at the port of Mobile from any foreign country since the Payne law was repealed.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman misunderstood me, if he understood me to say anything about pig iron. I spoke of steel.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, pig iron is the basis.

Mr. MONDELL. I can understand how you can make pig iron, with the cheap black labor down there, very cheaply.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will renew the statement. I challenge the gentleman to show that there has been a pound of steel landed at the port of Mobile or that there has been a steel rail or a pound of pipe or a pound of steel that competes with the products of the Birmingham district.

Mr. MONDELL. The statement I made was taken from some newspaper article which I saw——

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a Republican paper.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Some gentleman theorizes that it can be done; but I am talking about the facts, and I challenge the gentleman——

Mr. MONDELL. It is under a Mobile date line.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, it is a mighty easy thing for the gentleman to find it and put it in the RECORD. The importations of iron or steel at the port of Mobile are shown in the Treasury reports, and I challenge the gentleman to sustain his statement by the records that he can get if he wants to get them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to speak on the pending bill, but to briefly mention another matter. I had the pleasure yesterday of visiting the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis and attending the graduating exercises of the class of 1914.

That class started four years ago with 231 members and graduated only 154. There were three Colorado boys in the class, and all three of them were within the 10 honor graduates of the class.

Midshipman Edward Ellsberg, of Denver, graduated with the highest honors and was the first one to be presented with his diploma by President Woodrow Wilson. Young Ellsberg not only graduated at the head of the class of 1914, but he led his class during the entire four years' course and was the honor man at the end of each year. In addition to the distinction of making the highest record in scholarship during the entire four years, he won several very highly prized medals. He won the splendid silver cup annually donated by the Daughters of the American Revolution for the one in each graduating class who attains the highest proficiency in seamanship and international law. He also won the honorary prize of a navigating sextant presented annually by Col. R. M. Thompson, of the class of '68, for the highest proficiency in navigation; also a medal for fencing, another for the championship in dueling, and two or three others for the best English essay work.

Another boy, Midshipman Frederick E. Pelton, of Denver, stood fourth in the class one year, fifth another, sixth another, and graduated eighth in the class.

I am supremely proud to say to the House that those two Colorado boys were my first appointments to Annapolis. [Applause.] They were the two highest in a competitive examination which I held during my first term in Congress.

The other Colorado boy that graduated with honors was Abraham Marron, also of Denver, appointed by the late Senator Charles J. Hughes, jr. His standing was ninth in the class. I believe I am safe in saying that no State in this Union has ever equaled this record. It speaks well for our school system and is an inspiration to the youth of our State. Colorado is proud of these boys, and they are entitled to this mention and this record, because the course at that academy is most awfully hard work.

By reason of their rank, Midshipman Ellsberg was allowed to select his ship, and he chose the new battleship Texas, while, I understand, young Pelton and Marron chose the battleship Maryland, to which they will be assigned.

This is the first time in the history of our State that Colorado has carried off the highest honors at Annapolis. Some 25 years ago Gen. Irving Hale, from Colorado, was the honor man at West Point, and he has been a credit to our State ever since; and I am confident that these three Colorado boys will likewise during the future years be an honor to our country, to the Navy, and to the Centennial State. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, for many months there has been a constant denial on the part of the members of the present administration of any business depression in the United States. However, a few days ago, when a delegation of western business men called upon the Chief Executive at the White House and asked that some of the proposed antitrust legislation be put over until next winter, so as to allow business to adjust itself to the laws already passed, the President admitted that there was a business depression in the country, but said it is purely "psychological."

Many of us on the minority side of the House have constantly contended and have presented facts to prove that there is business depression all over the United States. But heretofore we have been called "calamity howlers." At last we have wrung a confession from high authority that there is business depression, although it is contended by the Democratic administration that there is no real reason for that depression.

The Democratic Party has constantly assured the manufacturers and business men of this country that there was nothing to fear from the legislation proposed by the members of that party. No doubt the manufacturers and producers for a time believed the statements that emanated from the lips of the distinguished gentlemen on the other side of the aisle and from the gentleman who heads the executive department of this Government. They have had an awakening. The New York Sun published a little item several months ago which exactly pictures the condition of the business world to-day. It is as follows:

"KIND WORDS CAN NEVER DIE."

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN.

SIR: The kind words from the administration to the business interests of the country remind me of the thrilling melodrama entitled "Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model."

[Laughter.]

In the early part of the play the villain pushed Nellie off the Brooklyn Bridge. Later he threw her overboard from an Atlantic liner. Later still he thrust her under a descending elevator. The next time they met he said: "Nellie, why do you fear me?"

[Laughter and applause.]

The business interests of the country have grown afraid of the legislation that was threatened and that is being enacted by the Democratic majority. Yesterday we passed three of the so-called antitrust bills, the "three little maids from school." [Laughter.] One of them at least will again have a deterrent effect upon the business of this country—the so-called Clayton antitrust bill——

Mr. ADAIR. Did not most of the gentleman's party in the House vote for those bills?

Mr. KAHN. I am only responsible for my vote.

Mr. ADAIR. I think about two Republicans to one voted for them.

Mr. KAHN. I do not know what the proportion is, but I think my friend is mistaken. At any rate, there is one hope for the business interests of this country. In all the half-baked, undigested legislation to regulate business that has been passed by this House it has been so revised at the other end of the Capitol that in many instances it has been made less destructive than if it had been enacted in the form in which it left the House of Representatives.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman say that those bills would have a terrible effect on the business of the country?

Mr. KAHN. I say that they will have a deterrent effect on the business of the country.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You mean the crooked business that flourished under Republican administrations?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman uses the arguments of the demagogue now, and they are unworthy of him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Ah, I prithee, forgive me!

Mr. KAHN. Because it is the demagogue who tries to point out that all business is crooked.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. These are not designed to affect an honest business, but designed to affect the crooked business under which the country has been robbed.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, yes. There has been a great deal of honest, legitimate, genuine business in the country, and always will be, and some of the legislation that is proposed in these bills will affect honest, legitimate business adversely.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But give them a legitimate chance, which they have not had prior to this time.

Mr. KAHN. They will kill legitimate business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, nonsense.

Mr. KAHN. Some of the provisions will kill legitimate business, and the gentleman knows there are features in that Clayton bill that are bound to affect business adversely.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. In a few moments. I want to get on a little.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did not the gentleman vote for two out of the three bills?

Mr. KAHN. I voted for the first and third: yes, sir. [Laughter.] The first provides for a trade commission. There can be no harm in that. The third was a substitute, which was submitted in the closing hours of the debate for a very bad bill. The substitute embodied all the good points that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] contended for.

Mr. ADAIR. Does not the gentleman believe, if the antitrust bill is going to be detrimental, that the majority of the Republicans in the House who voted for it should take, at least, their portion of the blame for it?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know. It was legislation that emanated from the Democratic majority, and there is no doubt in my mind but that it will be toned down at the other end of this Capitol so as to make it a less dangerous piece of legislation.

Mr. ADAIR. But the majority of the Republicans thought it was good, or they would not have voted for it, I presume.

Mr. KAHN. Possibly, though not necessarily. A majority of the Republicans, I am informed, did not vote for it. There were about 54 Republicans, as I understand, who voted against it and only about 40 voted for it.

Mr. ADAIR. I understand that a majority of the Republicans voted for it.

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield further. My time is limited.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have had further confirmation from high authority that there is business depression in the great manufacturing sections of our country. Yesterday the newspapers published a speech that was delivered by the Secretary of Commerce at Raleigh, N. C. I have a very high opinion of the distinguished Secretary of Commerce, who served in this House, and we all know he is a well-meaning, well-intentioned gentleman. He undertook to say that the business of the country was highly prosperous in every section except the Northeast. He likened the business conditions to the weather map, and asserted that it is clear and white in the West, and clear and white in the Mississippi Valley, and in the region of the Great Lakes, but that over in the Northeast it is dull gray. If he were to study the conditions thoroughly, he would find that there is more or less business depression in the West, the Northwest, the Southwest, the East, the Southeast, and in every section of the country. There is general complaint from every quarter that times are dull. Some industries feel it more than others. But there is no evidence of great prosperity anywhere. There are more men out of employment now than for many years past.

The distinguished gentleman who presides over the Department of Commerce should have taken another and, to my mind, a more appropriate illustration. He should have likened the country to the condition that is spoken of by Æsop in his fable of "The Belly and the Members." That fable runs as follows:

One fine day it occurred to the Members of the Body that they were doing all the work and the Stomach was having all the food. So they held a meeting, and after a long discussion decided to strike work till the Stomach consented to take its proper share of the work. So for a day or two the Hands refused to take the food, the Mouth refused to receive it, and the Teeth had no work to do. But after a day or two the Members began to find that they themselves were not in a very active condition; the Hands could hardly move, and the Mouth was all parched and dry, while the Legs were unable to support the rest. So thus they found that even the Stomach in its dull quiet way was doing necessary work for the Body, and that all must work together or the Body will go to pieces.

Mr. Chairman, the northeastern part of this country is like the stomach referred to in the fable. The raw material from the farms and the mines of this country go there to be converted into finished products. The food products of the farm are sent there to feed the operatives in the mills, the factories, and the workshops of that important area. The stomach is out of condition. It is disordered and ailing, according to the admission of the Secretary of Commerce, and that condition has its baneful effect upon every other section of the United States. Any man who will honestly investigate will find that there is business depression all over the United States, the Secretary of Commerce to the contrary notwithstanding. I rather think he is the Mark Tapley of this administration. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

In his speech at Raleigh the Secretary rejoiced that "we have sent large sums abroad of late." It were far better for the people of the United States if these large sums had been kept at home and invested in existing enterprises of this country or in the establishment of new ones. But capital is once more showing its timidity. It is afraid of your radical legislation, your legislation "with teeth in it," as was suggested on this floor a day or two ago. The exodus of these large sums to other lands is one of the surest signs, one of the best proofs, of business depression.

Mr. Chairman, the trouble is that at the present time dilettanteism is at the helm in this country. Doctrinaires and theorists occupy the positions of high station. The people are demanding that practical men shall again run the Government. And they will speak in no uncertain language at the ballot box next November. They know that there is dullness and uncertainty in the business world. The evidences of the depression are found everywhere. Take this item from this morning's Washington Herald as an illustration. It reads:

PENNSY'S IDLE EQUIPMENT.

Eighty-six million dollars' worth of freight cars and locomotives are standing idle on the sidetracks in the yards, roundhouses, and shops of the Pennsylvania Railroad system as a consequence of the depression in railroad traffic, which in the last fortnight, according to the figures showing the decline in the movement of loaded freight cars, has become more acute than at any time since the present era of retrogression began months ago.

Very nearly one-third of the freight cars owned by the Pennsylvania lines, east and west, are out of use. The number of cars idle, according to the latest reports which were available yesterday, is 80,000. The Pennsylvania lines own, altogether, approximately 250,000 freight cars. More than 300 locomotives are idle, out of a total of 7,000 owned. The percentage of idle freight cars is naturally greater than that of idle locomotives, because reducing the number of cars in a train is a more common proceeding than eliminating a train altogether.

That item tells its own story—a story that can not be controverted.

Contrast that condition with the one that prevailed only two or three years ago, under a Republican administration, when it was impossible to supply the various sections of the country with enough freight cars to move the great crops and carry the freight of the great business interests of this country. Yes; contrast the present condition with the condition of two or three years ago.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a question there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. Does the gentleman mean to say that there were no idle freight cars in 1907, under a Republican administration? Thousands of them were idle all over the country.

Mr. KAHN. In 1907 there was a temporary condition of depression, due largely to overspeculation in Wall Street. It was very brief, and in the following years there was an enormous demand for cars. That demand continued practically through all the remaining years of Republican administration.

Mr. ADAIR. But the gentleman said that such a thing had never happened before.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman evidently misunderstood what I said.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for an interruption?

Mr. KAHN. I believe I am correct when I say that there never were so many cars idle as at the present time.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I would like to know——

Mr. KAHN. I regret I can not yield. I have but little time left.

In looking over some of the publications of the present Chief Executive I find this statement in the American Political Science Review of February, 1911, in an article entitled "The law and the facts," in which the President, then Mr. Wilson, said:

> I do not know how some students of politics get along without literature as some of them make shift to do—without interpretation of poetry or of any of the other imaginative illuminations of life—or without art, or any of the means by which men have sought to picture to themselves what their days mean or to represent to themselves the voices that are forever in their ears as they go their doubtful journey. They read history, indeed, in search of the "facts"; but if they miss the deepest facts of all, the spiritual experience, the vision of the mind, the aspirations of the spirit, that are the pulse of life, I do not see how they can understand the facts or know what really moves the world.

That in a measure may explain what the Chief Executive meant when he told the western business men that the business depression is "psychological." He has "visions of the mind." He sees visions of prosperity in this country where there is business depression; and he doubtlessly is surprised because the hard-headed, practical business men of the country, realizing that their enterprises are in a serious and uncertain condition, do not have visions of the same kind. The business man does not have to go in search of "facts," so far as existing conditions in the business and financial world are concerned. He finds them ready at hand wherever he turns. He has no "visions" of prosperity, because there is no prosperity at the present time.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield. I have only three or four minutes longer.

Now, the trouble with our friends on the other side is that they do not recognize actual conditions. They deal with theories. They see "visions." That is the unfortunate part of it. A good many of you on the Democratic side rebel inwardly at some of the legislation that is being forced through this House. It were better for the country if you were to rebel outwardly and refuse to lend yourselves to the enactment of drastic legislation which is bound to cripple the commercial interests of the United States. Fortunately, there is more deliberation at the other end of this Capitol. Fortunately, there is no resorting to gag rules to shut off debate and prevent proper discussion of great public problems in that body. There, at any rate, the Democratic majority on a recent vote showed they were not at all in accord with one of the highly lauded policies of the present administration. Let me illustrate: On October 27, 1913, the President of the United States delivered a speech at Mobile, Ala. It was a very excellent literary utterance. It was commended on all sides. Its high ideals met with general favor. In that speech the President said this:

> I want to take this occasion to say that the United States will never again seek one additional foot of territory by conquest—

Now, in order to put the Democratic Party to the test at the other end of the Capitol, a distinguished Senator [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] offered an amendment to the "justification resolution" in the Mexican trouble that was then being considered in the Senate. That amendment read:

> Be it further resolved, That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over Mexico or any portion of the same, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of Mexico and every portion thereof to its people.

That amendment was clearly in line with the President's altruistic sentiments uttered in the Mobile speech. Then the roll was called upon that amendment. It was defeated by a vote of 44 to 39. Of the 44 votes cast against it, 42 were Democrats, who refused to follow the President of the United States in his position never again to seek a foot of territory by conquest; 2 were Republicans. Of the 39 votes in favor of the amendment, 37 were Republicans, 1 was a Democrat, and 1 was a Progressive.

Mr. Chairman, I merely cited this instance as an evidence of the independence from Executive pressure of the Democratic majority at the other end of this Capitol.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield a minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] read an extract from the Washington Herald of this morning, written by whom I do not know. I want, in connection with that, to have incorporated in the RECORD an article from the Star of this afternoon, covering an estimate of the situation as made by Dun's review of trade and Bradstreet's review, as follows:

TRADE ADVICES OPTIMISTIC—IMPROVED SENTIMENT REFLECTED IN SOME EXPANSION IN VOLUME.

NEW YORK, June 6.

Dun's review of the week says:

"Advices from the leading commercial and industrial centers are more optimistic and the improved sentiment is reflected in some expansion in the volume of trade. Of late there has been marked increase in the number of orders placed with manufacturers, and there is much less idle machinery than a month ago.

"There is a healthier tone to the dry-goods market. A better inquiry is noted for wool, which has lost none of its former strength."

Bradstreet's review says:

"Sentimentally and fundamentally, trade conditions are better, even though irregularity is still in evidence. Jobbing trade at many points outside of the Southeast, and particularly in the Northwest, has broadened; interest in fall and winter goods is gradually developing; there is more doing in retail lines; some improvement has appeared in connection with collections; larger sales of southern pig iron are noted; wool is active at strong prices; textile mills are fairly well employed; crop conditions have improved; railway traffic is heavier."

I also wish to insert the following item from the Philadelphia Ledger of to-day concerning the improvement of the steel trade:

EQUIPMENT ORDERS CHEER STEEL TRADE—NEW YORK CENTRAL AND ILLINOIS CENTRAL BETWEEN THEM CONTRACT FOR 10,300 CARS—LOOK FOR PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD RAIL ORDER TO-DAY.

NEW YORK, June 5.

Makers of railroad equipment and rails are encouraged by the orders placed this week, and they expect the orders will be increased to-morrow or early next week by a big rail contract from the Pennsylvania Railroad. This company has about completed arrangements for the purchase of some 76,000 tons of rails, in addition to 20,000 tons ordered two months ago, and it was reported in the steel trade that the contract would probably be approved by noon to-morrow.

The Steel Corporation is expected to receive a large part of the order. The earlier purchase of 20,000 tons was rolled by the Bethlehem and Pennsylvania Steel Cos., and it is understood that in the placing of these orders the specifications were altered slightly so as to make the cost of manufacture somewhat less on subsequent contracts.

The New York Central has ordered 7,300 cars, of which 4,300 will be made by the American Car & Foundry Co. and 3,000 by the Standard Steel Car Co.. The Illinois Central has distributed contracts for 3,000 box cars among the Western Steel Car Co., Haskell & Barker, American Car & Foundry Co., and the Standard Steel Car Co.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 14242. An act to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States Federal building at Harrisburg, Pa.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, that part of the pending measure which is of great significance reads as follows:

That the second sentence in section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, which reads as follows: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. President, if this bill were of concern only to the section of the country which I in part have the honor to represent, I would not venture to intrude any observations into a debate which has already been somewhat extended and which has been characterized by a vast amount of research and a most learned exposition of the great principles involved in the bill. But it is not of concern alone to the State which I in part represent, nor to the Pacific coast, nor to any other section of the country. It involves the great question whether the Panama Canal is to be an American canal or whether it is to be an international canal, subject to the joint control of the United States and the other nations of the world, particularly represented by Great Britain.

The issues involved in this bill affect the national integrity of the United States. Later on I shall undertake to refer to some of the purposes and motives of the great interests which have been active in prosecuting this issue before the country and in Congress and to point out that they verge at least upon an attack on our national independence. Some of the people who have been most influential in this movement have on various occasions expressly declared their desire for a surrender of our national independence and for a merger with the great nation which is our principal antagonist in the effort to direct and control this great waterway.

The issues involved in this bill will determine the direction of the current of trade and the commerce of the world. Upon the determination of this question depends in large measure the future of the shipping interest of the United States—whether we are to build up a merchant marine and become a great commercial Nation, or whether we are to cast a blight upon what we already have and absolutely destroy the prospect of any future increase.

This great question, in my judgment—and I think it can be demonstrated—will determine whether the United States will enjoy the benefits of its own domestic commerce, or that commerce which is now domestic—all that vast trade which goes from that portion of the United States east of the Rocky Mountains, connected by the navigable waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic Ocean and the rivers connecting with them—the commerce of which goes from that vast region to our own people of the Pacific coast—or whether that commerce, through economic forces that will be put in operation by the repeal of this law—beyond the control of any legislation—shall be turned over to a foreign country.

It involves the question whether the trade of our people coming the other way from the Pacific coast to the eastern parts of the United States, in the great natural products of our Pacific States, shall be retained in the hands of our own people as a means of their livelihood and an increase of their wealth, or whether by opening this canal upon such terms that it will be impossible for our people to compete, will throw that commerce also into the hands of the ships of Great Britain plying from the ports of Canada on the Pacific Ocean.

Strange to say, Mr. President, the entire interest which Great Britain has in this controversy, and which makes the issue, can be traced back, along clear and connected lines, to the violent and lawless acts of that strange nation of pirates called the buccaneers, operating in the Caribbean Sea in the early part of the seventeenth century.

The treaties which have been negotiated between the United States and Great Britain in regard to a canal were based upon the assumption that Great Britain had certain interests which it was necessary for the United States to acquire in order to construct a canal. Those interests consisted of the claims of Great Britain to what is called the Mosquito Coast, and they consisted of that alone. The Mosquito Coast was Spanish territory. It was a part of that vast area discovered by Christopher Columbus and visited by him in 1502, explored by Spaniards in 1521, and settled permanently by Spain in the following year.

Later on certain islands along that coast were occupied as a rendezvous by the buccaneers, who were devastating the Spanish commerce in that sea. Great Britain continued to make claims, having recognized the settlement of these lawless pirates and taken them under her protection later on, until toward the middle of the nineteenth century, when the matter of the construction of an Isthmian Canal by the United States had become a practical question and was attracting the interest and attention of our people and the people of the world. Great Britain's claims were constantly being extended, and her rights of suzerainty over the Mosquito Indians on the coast of Nicaragua were constantly disputed by the United States as being in violation of the Monroe doctrine.

There is no foundation of right or justice in international law or in morals for any claim which Great Britain had to seize the territory of Spain upon that coast, which in 1821 became the territory of the free, sovereign Republic of Nicaragua, which had been recognized and taken under the good will and protection of this great Republic; and yet, as the proposition of constructing a canal developed, Great Britain prosecuted her claims to that territory more and more vigorously, inciting a great deal of hostility in the United States.

In 1848, without warrant of authority, under the pretense of the Mosquito Indian protectorate, she seized the Atlantic terminus of the only canal route which the United States at that time contemplated. She seized it deliberately, in my judgment, for the express purpose of acquiring an interest in any future waterway which might be constructed there. That seizure created great excitement in the United States. Upon that and those events which preceded it, to which I have referred, are based the subsequent treaties, the present controversy, and every claim which Great Britain has, to a word, in the control and management of the canal which is now about completed.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was negotiated—and I shall not stop now to characterize it or to analyze it, because it is not relevant or important to the question to be here determined—but it was negotiated and, wisely or unwisely, in good or in bad form, for the purpose of freeing ourselves, so far as the canal was concerned, from the incubus which sat upon that great project through this lawless act of the seizure of Greytown, at the mouth of the river San Juan, on the Nicaragua shore, the Atlantic terminus and a necessary portion of the canal.

What was the consideration which Great Britain agreed to give in that treaty? I think, perhaps, the best way to state that is to call attention to the exact language of what Great Britain agreed to do. In article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty Great Britain agreed that she would never—erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any domain over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford—

That referred to the protection of the Mosquito Indians. The language is quite pertinent and significant as indicating precisely what sort of interest Great Britain had which she put into this contract as a consideration—or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any State or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same.

That was the consideration which Great Britain gave or promised to give but which she failed to carry out. She has continued down to the present day, in defiance of that clear and express language, to do the very specific thing which in artcle 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty she agreed not to do. She has colonized and has assumed and exercised dominion over parts of Central America. She possesses to-day in British Honduras, in defiance of this treaty and in violation of the consideration which she agreed to give, a great and rich territory 225 miles long, 40 or more miles in width, covered with valuable forests in some parts and containing fertile lands in other parts, with valuable seaports and islands; and her own authorities recognize the fact, as they express it, that it was a "flagrant" violation of her obligations under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

In a recent edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, a British publication, in an edition printed at Cambridge, England, in 1910, volume 6, page 475, is this statement:

It seems to be a just conclusion that when in 1852 the Bay Islands were erected into a British "colony" this was a flagrant infraction of the treaty; that as regards Belize, the American arguments were decidedly stronger and more correct historically.

That was the violated treaty which, in turn, was the basis and consideration for the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and that, Mr. President, is the chain of title, so to speak, which advocates of this repeal set up as the deed and warranty of the United States to construct, own, and operate the Panama Canal, a canal constructed in another territory, upon the soil of another sovereign nation, where Great Britain never owned nor claimed to own a foot of soil, where she did not possess any of the authority which she describes in such peculiar language as a "protection" which she affords or an "alliance" which she may have with any State or people "or the Government" of any State or people.

Without referring for the moment to the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties, which constitute the subsequent stages and links in this alleged chain of title to this great property, I here make the assertion that the title to the Panama Canal can not be traced through that chain of title, but is to be traced through an entirely different series of transactions, with other people, with which Great Britain had no concern and no connection whatever, and that other title, with which Great Britain had no concern, has no missing link, is clear and connected, and indisputable.

It is a peculiar thing, Mr. President, that in the discussion of this question and of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties it should be assumed by learned Senators that certain terms and language used in those treaties relate to the Panama Canal. Those treaties refer to a canal to be constructed and to rights to be acquired subsequently to the execution of the treaties. Why, Mr. President, the Panama Canal was partly in use; it was in large part constructed by the genius of the great French people long before the Hay-Pauncefote treaties were executed, and the title to it was perfect and secure. I propose to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to call attention to the documents upon which that title rested, which seem to me to demonstrate that Great Britain has no ground upon which she can make the astounding claim that she has, to all intents and purposes, in the Panama Canal a partnership with the United States, which acquired it from the Republic of Colombia as the assignee and grantee of the concessionaire, who, in 1878, first acquired the necessary property rights to construct a canal at that point.

Mr. President, a great deal has been said in argument and in official papers, and particularly by Sir Edward Grey—and his statements are important because they are official, because they are the statements of the foreign minister of Great Britain, our antagonist in this matter—about the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; in fact, Sir Edward Grey bases his principal claim upon the eighth article of that treaty. He claims, as I have already said and as I repeat, in order that what I say may be clear, a part control in the Panama Canal, and because of that and because of its importance I want also to refer to the exact language of that article. It provides:

ARTICLE 8.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

I desire to make it clear that I deny that this article has any force and effect. I think that was demonstrated most conclusively by the distinguished Senator from California in his discussion of this question, but, because it is set up by Great Britain as the principal basis of her contention, I refer to it. The question, of course, is whether there is anything in the article, conceding that it has any effect whatever, that has any bearing upon the Panama Canal.

It has been asserted by a number of Senators in the Senate and by a great many people out of the Senate that the United States could not have constructed the canal without the consent of Great Britain. Mr. President, the United States had as much right on the Isthmus of Panama as had the Republic of France or as had the Compagnie Universelle du Canal de Panama, of France, the company which we call the Old Panama Canal Co., or as had the receiver or liquidator of that company, which took over its property and its works, or as had the New Panama Canal Co., which succeeded it. It has never been disputed that they had a right to construct a canal at Panama. They were constructing a canal there; they completed it in a large part. We took their route, and you can see upon the great cliffs which have been created by the cut at Culebra, a line marking the extent of the French excavation. We adopted their plan; we have taken their route. The Gatun locks and dam are in accordance with the French plan—larger, but substantially based on the same principle. It is their route; it is their work which we took advantage of. That is the canal which we now are ready to operate in its completed form; and, until this controversy arose under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty no human being ever heard a claim made by Great Britain or by any one in her behalf that she had an interest in the Panama Canal, which I have just described, or any right to be considered in the management of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am interested in the Senator's discussion of this phase of the question. I assume that the Senator is of the opinion, which seems reasonable, that if France had completed that project neither Great Britain nor any other nation would have felt that it had any special interest in the canal or could control it in any way or to any extent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very decidedly of that opinion; so much so, in fact, and the evidence upon that subject is so conclusive, that it seems to me doubtful whether Great Britain herself would deny it.

I note that the language in article 8 which I have read refers not only to a canal connecting the two oceans, but to a railway or contemplated railway at Panama, and to any railway which might be constructed at Tehuantepec. I have never heard of any joint protection of the United States and Great Britain over the Tehuantepec Railroad nor over the Panama Railroad. Both are referred to in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The point I am making is that it never has been contended that under article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty any rights were acquired by Great Britain or by the United States over a railroad either in Mexico or in Panama. It relates to entirely different matters. It refers, as will be noted, to treaty stipulations which were in the future to be made, and which never have been made. That point is referred to by our negotiators in the voluminous documents which have been printed here relating to the formulation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The third line of article 8 says:

They hereby—

What? Establish a protection over a canal or over a railway? By no means—agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations.

Nobody has pointed out any treaty stipulation made in pursuance of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty relating to any canal or to any railway other than the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which, as I shall point out in a moment, related to a canal at Nicaragua, and said nothing about railroads.

How did we acquire the Panama Canal? We did not acquire it from Great Britain, because Great Britain never owned it or had any interest in it. If we had dug a canal at Nicaragua there might have been, however lawless its origin, some foundation for a claim on the part of Great Britain that the property necessary for its construction was acquired from her, but not at Panama.

In 1878 there was a concession granted—and this is the beginning of the title to the Panama Canal—known as the Wyse concession, and which begins as follows:

Eustorgio Salgar, secretary of the interior and of foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, duly authorized, of the one part—

Nobody denied that the United States of Colombia had a right to grant this concession—and of the other part Lucien N. B. Wyse, chief of the Isthmus scientific surveying expedition in 1876, 1877, and 1878, member and delegate of the council of administration of the International Interoceanic Canal Association, presided by Gen. Etienne Turr, in conformity with powers bestowed at Paris from the 27th to the 29th of October, 1877, which he has exhibited in legal form, have celebrated the following contract:

ARTICLE 1. The Government of the United States of Colombia grants to Mr. Lucien N. B. Wyse, who accepts it in the name of the International Interoceanic Canal Association, represented by their council of administration, the exclusive privilege for the construction across its territory and for the operating of a canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Said canal may be constructed without restrictive stipulations of any kind.

This concession is made under the following conditions:

First. The duration of the privilege shall be for 99 years from the day on which the canal shall be wholly or partially opened to the use of the public or when the grantees or their representatives commence to collect the dues on transit and navigation.

* * * * * * *

ART. 6. The United States of Colombia reserve to themselves the right to pass their war vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times and without paying any dues whatever. The passage of the canal is strictly closed to war vessels of nations in a state of open hostility with one or more other nations and which may not have acquired by public treaty with the Colombian Government the right to pass through the canal at all times.

* * * * * * *

The company shall carry gratis through the canal or on the auxiliary railway the men destined for the service of the nation, for the service of the State through whose territory the canal and railroad may pass, or for the service of the police, with the object of guarding against foreign enemies or for the preservation of public order, and shall also transport gratis the baggage of such men, their war materials, armament, and clothing which they may need for the service assigned to them.

* * * * * * *

The company guarantees to the Government of Colombia that the share of the latter shall in no case be less than the sum of $250,000 a year—which is the same as that received as its share in the earnings of the Panama Railroad, so that if in any year the 5, 6, 7, or 8 per cent should not reach said sum it shall be completed out of the common funds of the company.

Mr. President, as is well known, that concession was about to expire, and on December 26, 1890, it was extended for 10 years. I shall not detain the Senate to read that document, which I have in my hand. That extension in turn was about to expire, and on April 4, 1893, another contract was executed, signed by the representatives of the Republic of Colombia at Bogota and by the representatives of the French Canal Co., extending the franchise or concession, as follows:

The extension of 10 years granted in article 1 of the contract of 1890 to the liquidator of the Compagnie Universelle du Canal de Panama remains in force, subject to the conditions then provided, except the second, which is modified by the extension until October 31, 1894, of the period within which the new company is to be formed and work on the canal is to be resumed in a serious and permanent manner.

The term of 10 years shall begin to run from the date of the formal organization of the new company.

On April 26, 1900, another contract was executed between the Republic of Colombia and the representatives of the new canal company, granting a further extension of the franchise for six years.

When the United States, after having abandoned the idea of constructing a canal at Nicaragua—and I desire in a moment to call attention to the connection of its action in abandoning that route with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—and, through the action of the Senate in reversing the action of the House of Representatives in 1902, concluded to construct a canal at Panama, it took up negotiations with this French canal company, which owned these existing franchises giving it a certain period in which to construct the canal and the privilege of operating it for 99 years after the commencement of its operation. The canal company, in proper form under French law, obtained authority from its stockholders to sell its franchises and its property to the United States for the sum of $40,000,000 in gold. That sum was paid to the new French canal company by the United States for the Panama Canal, and constitutes the principal foundation of its title.

Of course, before completing such a transaction the United States, as was perfectly natural, made the most careful investigation of this title and of the right of the French canal company to sell to the United States. It obtained the opinion of a most prominent French lawyer, Mr. Waldeck Rousseau, upon whose opinion and upon an independent investigation also the Attorney General of the United States, who, with his staff of legal advisers, had investigated the matter most thoroughly, both as to the rights of the French canal company under the French law and their rights under the concession granted by the Republic of Colombia and the laws of that Republic, advised the President that the title was good and that they had a right to transfer it and that its deed would convey to the United States this canal and all the rights and privileges specified in the concession.

I want to read very briefly just a few lines of the significant parts of the opinion of Mr. Waldeck Rousseau, whom the United States consulted. He says, in the first paragraph of his opinion:

The concession for the Interoceanic Panama Canal was obtained by M. Wyse. (Agreement of Mar. 23, 1878; law 28 of 1878, of Colombia.)

Not only by its nature was it transferable, but its transfer to a company by the concessionary and by this company to other companies or capitalists was expressly contemplated by article 21.

Incidentally, he remarks:

There is no need of reviewing the difficulties encountered by the Compagnie Universelle or its financial vicissitudes. In 1889 it was driven to dissolution.

That was the old company.

In paragraph 19 he says:

Finally, besides the liquidator of the Compagnie Universelle and the new company, there was a third party interested in maintaining the rights which it had under the concession of 1878—the Government of Colombia. Without referring to other documents exchanged between this Government and that of the United States of America, it is enough to say that on April 18, 1902, the envoy extraordinary of the Republic of Colombia to the United States agreed with the Secretary of State of the United States upon a treaty, article 1 of which contains an authorization by the Government of Colombia, given to the new company, to sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, property, and concessions, as well as the Panama Railroad, and all shares and parts of shares of this company. We shall omit, therefore, from the present opinion all objections based upon the prohibition of transfer to a foreign government contained in the law of 1878.

The first question, he states, is:

Has the New Panama Canal Co. a certain and absolute title to the property it has offered for sale to the Government of the United States?

And he answers it as follows:

The title of ownership—certain and absolute ownership—which is to be invoked for the benefit of the new company, comes from the contribution which was made to it by the liquidator of the Compagnie Universelle.

* * * * * * *

It is indisputable that everything which forms the subject of the present plan of transfer to the United States is comprised in the contribution enumerated in article 5.

There is no dispute as to the validity of the title of the Compagnie Universelle to the property which was the subject of this contribution.

If the Compagnie Universelle was indeed the owner of the concession and of what we have called its increment, had it the right to transfer them? Did it transfer them regularly? Such are the first two questions to be examined.

II.—The Compagnie Universelle had the right to transfer the concession, because it was the owner of it, the right to alienate being one of the elements of ownership.

To make it otherwise it must be shown that the instrument by which it acquired them contained a restriction of this elementary right. Now, not only does this restriction not exist in the contract of 1878, but it contemplates a transfer and even successive transfers, and authorizes them. Furthermore, the transfer made was known to the original grantor—the Government of Colombia—it ratified it both beforehand and afterwards. (See especially the agreement of extension of December 26, 1890, stipulating that the liquidator shall transfer all the assets to a new company—article 1 of the agreement of April 5, 1893, giving the liquidator time to form a new company—the agreement of May 7, 1900, in which the newly formed company is expressly mentioned and recognized.)

The right of transfer by the Compagnie Universelle belonging to it, from the very fact that it was owner, this right not having been restricted by the agreement of concession, but, on the contrary, expressly recognized both by the agreements of concession and by the subsequent agreements above mentioned, we are of the opinion that the right of the Compagnie Universelle to transfer to the new company the whole of its rights is absolutely certain.

Mr. President, the subsequent transactions of the United States for the purchase of the canal with Colombia and with the Republic of Panama are well known. There have been disputes in regard to them, but suffice it to say, for the purposes of determining this issue, Great Britain was not concerned in them.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Before this transfer was made by the French company had the payments, the annuities of $250,000, been paid regularly right along by the French company?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year was to be paid out of the earnings of the canal when it was completed. Of course that was not paid, but——

Mr. CRAWFORD. There were payments from the proceeds of the railroad?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; there were payments from the railroad prior to its acquirement by the Panama Canal Co.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What I had in mind was this: As I recall it, under the treaty with Panama the United States pays to the Republic of Panama an annuity of $250,000. The question is whether the origin of that obligation is not traceable back to this previous obligation on the part of the French company to the Colombian Republic.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So the circumstances dovetail in that respect.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly they do. There were payments also made in a lump sum for the various renewals of the concession. I have here the proof—that is, the publication of the proof—of those payments having been made. There never has been any question as to the payment of any annuity that was due or of the purchase price of the original concession or of any renewal. Among the later payments, and that would in itself carry evidence that previous accounts had been satisfactorily taken care of, is this taken from the records of the deliberations of the council of administration of the New Panama Canal Co. at the session of January 9, 1902. Naming the officers of the company present, the minutes recite as follows:

The council decides unanimously to make an offer—

This is not what I thought it was, but I will read it—

The council decides unanimously to make an offer at a fixed price for the cession to the Government of the United States of all the properties and rights which the new company possesses on the Isthmus, without any exception, for $40,000,000, and it delegates to its president, M. Bo, all powers to transmit that offer and effect and sign the said cession.

What I referred to previously is as follows:

On the 31st day of October proximo—

This is dated Bogota, September 12, 1896, Republic of Colombia, ministry of the treasury—

On the 31st day of October proximo deliver to the Messrs. Schloss & Bros., of London, 2,000,000 francs, being the annual payment due January, 1897—

This is addressed to the director of the New Panama Canal Co.—

Said delivery will be made in accordance with the contract between the Government of this Republic and the company you represent as administrator, respecting anticipated discount and formalities required in making the annual payment due. (1896.)

Your most obedient servant,

MANUEL PONCE DE LEON.

Document dated Republic of Colombia, ministry of treasury, Bogota, May 28, 1900:

Mr. ALEJANDRO MANCINI:

For your information I beg to transmit the following communication and the resolution pertaining to same:

Sec. 1, No. 159.] REPUBLIC OF COLOMBIA, MINISTRY OF WAR, Bogota, May 26, 1900.

The MINISTER OF THE TREASURY:

In conformity with authorization received from His Excellency the President of the Republic, communicated through the minister of state in the telegram I had the honor to transcribe for you in my official note No. 155, dated the 22d instant, I beg to state that this ministry notified the banking house of Fould & Co., of Paris, to accept as a deposit the 5,000,000 francs, French gold, which is to be paid by the New Panama Canal Co. for the concession of "prolongation," as I had the honor of informing you for the conclusion of the business.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

MANUEL CASABIANCA.

This is followed with various other documents indicating that that order was carried out and most conclusive evidence that all those payments were made.

That constitutes, Mr. President, what the United States has in the way of title for the Panama Canal. When the United States paid $40,000,000 to the New French Canal Co. it was not paid on the condition that Great Britain should approve of it or that Great Britain should share in the amount of it. She had no original interest in the property, the franchises, the rights, the partially constructed canal for which $40,000,000 were paid, and none was created in her by the payment of the $40,000,000 to the New French Canal Co.

In other words, the United States not only acquired the physical property but it acquired the incorporeal right without any more conditions attached to it in the hands of the United States than were attached to it in the hands of the original concessionaries of the Republic of Colombia. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty with all the dispute about its meaning and effect never referred to this canal, which was already in existence and which Great Britain and the United States at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made had no right to make a contract in reference to.

All through the negotiations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or which resulted in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the correspondence between the diplomatic representatives of the United States and Great Britain and the action of Congress subsequent to the negotiation and the proclamation of the treaty, the declarations of distinguished Senators who are advocating this repeal, such as the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], it is manifest and admitted that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made in the contemplation of the construction of a canal at Nicaragua, and if the general language referred to, by some vague and uncertain effect, would apply to canals constructed at other points it referred to some one of the 16 different points which at different times had been examined and reported upon as possible routes for interoceanic canals, and did not refer to the Panama Canal.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to refer to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I think the exposition of it has already been clear and conclusive, and all has been said that can be said by the advocates of repeal or the opponents of repeal of the tolls-exemption clause of the act of 1912. But there are some collateral questions connected with it which have not been referred to and which I want briefly to take up. I may be pardoned for repeating what, by the way, is admitted by the representatives of Great Britain, that the language which is in dispute in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty can not apply to the United States; that is, that Great Britain admits that paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 can not apply to the United States.

Sir Edward Grey assumed the discretion of selecting out of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty certain material provisions and excluding them from any binding effect upon the two countries because of the changed conditions existing under which the canal was constructed from those which were contemplated at the time the treaty was negotiated. The United States has the same right that Sir Edward Grey, representing the Empire of Great Britain, has, to select the other paragraphs of article 3, upon the same ground on which he proposes to exclude several paragraphs, and to exclude these also from any binding effect upon the two countries.

I think Sir Edward Grey's reasoning is good. It is sound in international law. In the first place, if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty be given the construction claimed by the advocates of this repeal, that article 3 in its general language includes the United States, it would be impracticable of enforcement, utterly inconsistent with the situation in which the United States is placed, utterly impossible. To say that this country, having bought the canal for $40,000,000 from private owners and for $10,000,000 from the Republic of Panama in order to extend the concession from 99 years to perpetuity, or in all effect a perpetual franchise—in order to enlarge the concession paying this additional $10,000,000 to Panama and an annuity of $250,000 a year forever—having established herself as a sovereign upon the territory so acquired, and with the consent of Great Britain and the acquiescence of everyone who is interested in this treaty having erected there muniments of war, probably the greatest guns, the most formidable fortifications that we possess in all the wide sweep of our national territory; to say that under those conditions—operating the canal with these great guns guarding the passage of ships through it—the language of this treaty can be construed so that the ships of war of the United States in a state of belligerency shall not revictual in the canal, nor within 3 marine miles of the entrance of the canal, could not depart from the canal within 24 hours of the departure of its enemy, is to say what is impossible and impracticable and unreasonable. Conditions are so utterly different from those which were contemplated when the treaty was negotiated, when it was thought the canal would be constructed at Nicaragua, that by every authority of international law the treaty is utterly worthless, and is what Mr. Waddington, the British ambassador at Paris, said to Lord Salisbury with reference to the Suez Canal convention of 1888, which is of most paramount importance in the discussison of this case, and which I will refer to a moment later, "qu'une feuille de papier sans valeur"—a worthless leaf of paper.

Mr. President, a good authority upon this question, one of our own citizens, recognized both at home and abroad as an authority, author of a history of diplomacy, skilled in international law, David Jayne Hill, says in one of his articles on the subject:

On the other hand, Great Britain, as the greatest of maritime powers, might profit greatly by the construction of such a canal; and there was the possibility that the United States, whose position in the Western Hemisphere had been profoundly modified in the 50 years that had elapsed since the signing of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, might consider it expedient to denounce that treaty, on the ground that treaties—

And this is the purpose for which I am reading this extract—the view upon the principle of law involved—even when alleged to be perpetual, are morally binding only rebus sic stantibus, and cease to be so when conditions have essentially changed.

In the same connection and to the same effect I read from another American author, Mr. Hannis Taylor, author of various works on international law and the British and American Constitutions. He says:

As treaties stand upon a basis of their own, entirely apart from private contracts, the law of nations has always recognized the fact that all such agreements are necessarily made subject to the general understanding that they shall cease to be obligatory so soon as the conditions upon which they were executed are essentially altered.

I pause here to remark that this seems to be a principle of international law about which there is little dispute, and yet, strange to say, when it comes to the discussion of this Panama Canal question, it seems to be impossible to get the advocates of this repeal to recognize that such a principle ever existed. However, it is a substantial, vital, important principle, which governs not only this treaty but all treaties.

The principle that all treaties are concluded upon the tacit condition, rebus sic stantibus, clearly recognized by Grotius (Chap. XVI, s. XXV et seq.) and Vattel (Book 2 c. 13, s. 200), has been denied by no modern authority. Hall, the greatest of the recent English publicists, whose book is the vade mecum of the British foreign office, declares in his work on International Law (s. 116) that neither party to a treaty "can make its binding effect dependent at will upon conditions other than those contemplated at the moment when the contract was entered into; and, on the other hand, a contract ceases to be binding so soon as anything which formed an implied condition of its obligatory force at the time of its conclusion is essentially altered." Mr. Oppenheim, now professor of international law in the University of Cambridge, has, in his great work, Volume I, page 550, section 539, said:

"It is an almost universally recognized fact that vital changes of circumstances may be of such a kind as to justify a party in notifying an unnotifiable treaty. The vast majority of publicists, as well as all the Governments of the members of the family of nations, agree that all treaties are concluded under the tacit condition rebus sic stantibus."

In my own work on International Public Law (s. 394) I have stated the matter in this way:

"So unstable are the conditions of international existence, and so difficult is it to enforce a contract between States after the state of facts upon which it was founded has substantially changed, that all such agreements are necessarily made subject to the general understanding that they shall cease to be obligatory so soon as the conditions upon which they were executed are essentially altered."

Having thus restated the rule, it was not strange, perhaps, that I should have been the first to apply it to the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, which contemplated the building of an interoceanic canal by the United States in foreign territory. It seems to me that a radical breach of the tacit condition, rebus sic stantibus, occurred when, in November, 1903, the Canal Zone became, by purchase, the domestic territory of the United States. It is hard to deny that by that event the tacit condition, rebus sic stantibus, was broken; and yet the subject is a delicate one—it should be approached with great calmness, great caution. The existence of the rule, rebus sic stantibus, as applied to the construction of treaties, has never been denied, so far as I know, and it is not at all likely that Great Britain will deny its existence in the present instance.

I want to cite one more authority.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that the Senator from Washington takes the position that the change of conditions, which arose by reason of the purchase of the Panama Canal Zone and the building of the canal at a different point than that contemplated under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, brings into existence the rule which he has just been discussing?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Partly those reasons and partly others, which made the difference of conditions still greater; in other words, a comparison between what was contemplated by the parties to the treaty as to conditions under which the canal should be built and the conditions under which the canal was actually built. In one case it was agreed by everybody, as I have the authority here to show—it was accepted by Great Britain, and it was expressly so stated over and over again—that the canal was to be constructed in Nicaragua, through territory owned by Nicaragua, at a point where Great Britain originally had a claim—an utterly lawless claim, in my judgment—and we considered the question foreclosed as to the origin of it, which she had in it, as a consideration for the construction of this canal; that the United States at that time did not dream of taking over and paying a large sum of money for a canal which was already in large part built and owned by a French company and acquiring from the government through whose territory it went the sovereignty over a strip of territory; that those conditions are so different that it makes the treaty inapplicable.

The other authority, Mr. President, which I want to cite in support of this principle, and applying it to this particular case, is Sir Edward Grey himself, in the principal official document which exists in the controversy over this question between the United States and Great Britain on the side of Great Britain. It is important not because Sir Edward Grey said it, but because it was the official expression of our opponents in this matter. He says:

I notice that in the course of the debate in the Senate on the Panama Canal bill the argument was used by one of the speakers that the third, fourth, and fifth rules embodied in article 3 of the treaty show that the words "all nations" can not include the United States, because, if the United States were at war, it is impossible to believe that it could be intended to be debarred by the treaty from using its own territory for revictualing its warships or landing troops.

I interrupt the reading here to say that there has been some confusion of argument, in my judgment, or misapprehension on the part of some of those who are interested in this question in assuming that articles 3, 4, and 5, as originally drawn, and when originally drawn were not intended to apply to the United States. The position is on both sides, as I understand that they were intended to apply to the United States when originally drawn, but that it is now conceded that they do not apply to the United States because of the changed conditions under which the canal was constructed from those which were contemplated at the time of the treaty.

The same point may strike others who read nothing but the text of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself, and I think it is therefore worth while that I should briefly show that this argument is not well founded.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 aimed at carrying out the principle of the neutralization of the Panama Canal by subjecting it to the same régime as the Suez Canal.

I want, later, to refer to that régime to show how utterly impossible it was and would have been to apply it to this canal.

Rules 3, 4, and 5 of article 3 of the treaty are taken almost textually from articles 4, 5, and 6 of the Suez Canal convention of 1888. At the date of the signature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the territory on which the Isthmian Canal was to be constructed did not belong to the United States, consequently there was no need to insert in the draft treaty provisions corresponding to those in articles 10 and 13 of the Suez Canal convention, which preserve the sovereign rights of Turkey and of Egypt and stipulate that articles 4 and 5 shall not affect the right of Turkey, as the local sovereign, and of Egypt, within the measure of her autonomy, to take such measures as may be necessary for securing the defense of Egypt and the maintenance of public order, and, in the case of Turkey, the defense of her possessions on the Red Sea.

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

I am glad they do not, because I am sure if they had done so they would find great support in the United States Senate. How should the principle of rebus sic stantibus be applied or measured? As Mr. Taylor says, with justice, of course. I was very much struck in reading the former speech of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], with his eloquent invitation to the Senate of the United States to not take such action as would give us the reputation among the nations of the world of making sharp bargains, of being guilty of sharp practice, of taking advantage of those with whom we were dealing. It would be too bad, it would be too unfortunate, if the United States should be caught in the act, after having expended a vast sum of money for this canal, having constructed it through its own efforts upon territory with which Great Britain had no concern, that we should be guilty of driving the sharp bargain and of perpetrating the sharp practice of saying that Great Britain should not have an equal share with us.

Why, Mr. President, if you talk of sharp practice and driving sharp bargains, there will be a monument of shrewdness to go down the ages if the contention of Great Britain is to prevail in this case—that having given nothing, proposing in her official documents that she be relieved of responsibility, saying in this very letter of Sir Edward Grey that she does not expect to have the burden of protecting this canal, yet she should come out of her diplomacy and her negotiations with Mr. Hay and Mr. Choate as a partner in the enterprise.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator having just spoken of England's being relieved of cost, expense, and responsibility by reason of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, what possible commercial interest or commercial or business advantage would Great Britain have had under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that she has not under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, if she obtains the construction of the treaty for which she contends? Notwithstanding the fact that she has been relieved of all burden and all possible responsibility, is she not in just as good a position commercially, without any expense or without any responsibility, as she possibly could have been if she had expended upon the canal a sum of money equal to that spent by the United States?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Absolutely.

Mr. BORAH. Is there any commercial advantage, in other words, which England would have had under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that she has not now?

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit an inquiry?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. What other object could England have had in substituting the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty except to get the advantage the Senator refers to? Surely when England makes a treaty she wants to gain something by it, does she not?

Mr. BORAH. I am rather inclined to agree with the Senator from Minnesota, but the argument has been made here, and has had its effect undoubtedly, that England gave up a vast amount of consideration, benefit, and advantage when she yielded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. CLAPP. Surely no one who has studied the diplomatic relations between England and the United States would suggest that, because it would be such a novel suggestion in the light of our diplomatic relations with that country.

Mr. BORAH. It is true, however, that Sir Edward Grey made that contention, and that has been followed up here by repeated arguments to the effect that Great Britain would have received nothing for what she gave up in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I was simply asking what did she give up?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Well, Mr. President, she agreed to give up all those peculiar things that she described in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, such as protection over nations or governments and alliances and influences in Central America, and she agreed never to colonize or to occupy territory in Central America; but, as I read from an English authority a moment ago, she flagrantly violated her agreement and still occupies a most valuable and rich territory in Central America.

To answer the Senator's question further, the sum and substance of Great Britain's claim is this, that the United States shall enjoy no advantage from the Panama Canal which Great Britain shall not likewise enjoy; so that if Great Britain had expended the entire amount necessary for its construction, in the purchase of the property and the concessions, and owned it absolutely, so far as she hereself is concerned she could not have enjoyed any more benefits in the canal than she will enjoy if this bill passes and settles, as it will settle forever, the international status of that canal.

I think that no candid man could ever imagine, if Great Britain had constructed the canal upon her territory, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the Clayton Bulwer treaty notwithstanding, that she would ever have countenanced for one moment or ever have entered into negotiations with the United States to consider the question of whether she could not do with it as she chose as to her own shipping.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. Would the Senator blame England for taking that attitude?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would rather admire her for taking it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that is what I thought.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would rather admire her for taking it; and that is the attitude which the United States ought to take.

I was just going to say, with reference to this principle of treaty law which I have been discussing, that it is not an unjust rule, and I am not advocating that it should be applied so as to do an injury to anyone, or so as to take advantage of anyone. I am trying to say what I can, in my feeble way, to protect the United States from having an injury done to her. The application of this rule under these circumstances, the United States having borne the burden of this great enterprise, the people of the United States from their hard efforts having paid the expense, is doing all that justice can call upon her to do if she opens the canal upon just and equitable rates to all the other nations of the world upon equal terms. Is there anything unfair about it? Is there any hardship from the application of the well-recognized principle of international law? I have not heard anybody demonstrate to the contrary.

Now, Mr. President, pursuing a little further——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield for a brief interruption.

Mr. BORAH. I only want to put in the RECORD a single statement in connection with what the Senator has said.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. This is from the London Times, under date of December 31, 1913. It says:

> The canal will be a boon to Europe. While the United States built it and glories in it, its commercial importance to the United States is a bagatelle as compared to its importance to the world's foreign trade.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator read that, and I want to follow it up by reading, in the first place, from Sir Edward Grey, who is my favorite author on this question. He says in this same official note:

> The volume of British shipping which will use the canal will, in all probability, be very large. Its opening will shorten by many thousands of miles the waterways between England and other portions of the British Empire, and if, on the one hand, it is important to the United States to encourage its mercantile marine—

I pause to say that here and there in the utterances of British statesmen, I find only suggestion of an expression of the great concern which the United States, from a national standpoint, has in this canal. I have searched in vain among the letters and declarations of the diplomatists who were supposed to protect our interest in the negotiations for any indication that they understood, or if they understood, that they had a concern for the tremendous interests of our country that are involved in this question.

Sir Edward Grey refers to it here:

> If, on the one hand, it is important to the United States to encourage its mercantile marine and establish competition between coastwise traffic and transcontinental railways—

That foreign statesman understood perfectly well what our own apparently were blind to. He says:

> It is equally important to Great Britain to secure to its shipping that just and impartial treatment to which it is entitled by treaty, and in return for a promise of which it surrendered the rights which it held under the earlier convention.

Mr. Joseph Choate, who was in London during the formation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1900, the discussion which ensued in regard to the Senate amendment, and the negotiations for the formulation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, has indicated in his correspondence, which has been published, how the United States was represented and the spirit in which our interests were protected.

I wish to call attention at this point, because I probably shall not refer to it again, to the fact that in this document, which was published, I think, in response to the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], supposed to contain all the correspondence with reference to these treaties, there are some rather significant omissions, including two letters from Mr. Choate. On page 10 a letter from Mr. Choate to Mr. Hay of January 15, 1901, is not published, and a notation appears to the effect that it is not on the department's files. On page 31 a letter from Mr. Hay to Mr. Choate, dated August 5, 1901, is referred to, and a notation is made that it is not on the department's files.

A gentleman who is interested in this matter has forwarded me some correspondence which he had recently with Mr. Choate in regard to the matter, and here is quite a significant statement, I think:

> DEAR SIR: Your letter of May 29 was duly received. I have now received the answer of the Secretary of State to my letter, whether he would have me comply with your request to have copies of the letters in question for publication in your pamphlet. The Secretary is of the opinion that I should not do so.

But we have a number of letters from Mr. Choate, and he seemed to be very much concerned about enabling the British Government to make a creditable showing to the House of Commons as to what it was doing in regard to this treaty. I should like to have the Senate know, particularly in the light of the question just asked by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], Mr. Choate's concern about that matter and as to the benefits which Great Britain would receive from this canal.

He said:

> Lord Lansdowne's object in insisting upon article 3a is to be able to meet the objectors in Parliament by saying that although they have given up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they have saved the "general principle," and have made it immediately effective and binding upon the United States as to all future routes and have dispensed with future "treaty stipulations"—

The words "treaty stipulations" are in quotation marks. That is what the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provided—that they should make future treaty stipulations in regard to a particular railroad or a particular canal. This "general principle" was not roaming around the world establishing in and of itself specific rules and regulations for any old canal that might be constructed anywhere. The general principle under which these nations agreed was that when they were constructing a canal they would come together in a treaty. Now, he says, they left that out, thereby—> making it much stronger than it was before. I think his all-sufficient answer is that by giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which stood in the way of building any canal—

It did not, as a matter of fact, but this is what Mr. Choate says—> he has insured the building of a canal for the benefit of Great Britain at the expense of the United States——

Mr. NORRIS. Whose letter is that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is Mr. Choate's letter to Mr. Hay, explaining to Mr. Hay what Lord Lansdowne could say to the House of Commons—> relieving Great Britain of all responsibility about it, now and forever, and imposed upon the United States stringent rules of neutrality as to Great Britain and all mankind.

That is the American spirit which showed itself through the Court of St. James at a time when we should have had a representative who understood and was concerned and was able to protect the interests of the United States.

In this negotiation it seems to me that many of these letters and statements by our diplomatic representatives at that time, indicating that they did not know exactly what this or that language meant, and they had not had much time to examine it, and they hoped they would soon get through with the "troublesome business," are hardly more than mere chatter. None of it, I think, was written into the treaty. No treaty ever would have been ratified with the views—changing, apparently, as they were, from day to day—of Mr. Choate and Mr. Hay and their uncertainty about the meaning of what they were doing, if it had ever been supposed by any Senator upon this floor when those treaties were here for ratification that those rambling comments would be read into the treaty and be a part of the obligations of the United States.

Mr. Choate says:

I've not had time—

He had been negotiating with Lord Lansdowne and Lord Pauncefote about the specific provisions in this treaty, and after having said what he told Lord Lansdowne, he says:

I've not had time to study this question carefully, but my present strong impression is that they would—

Do so-and-so.

These are only my hasty suggestions after having Lord Lansdowne's papers in my hands for only two busy days. I told him what I thought, because he wanted to know, and I give them to you for what they are worth.

* * * * * * *

Upon the whole the prospect of a satisfactory settlement of this troublesome matter seems to me better than it has ever been before.

That is the degree of interest and of knowledge which our representatives had in the formulation of this treaty, either as to the interests of the United States or as to the meaning of the treaty which they were negotiating.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was said by Sir Edward Grey to be based upon the Suez Canal convention of 1888, in which Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, and Turkey came to an agreement in regard to the Suez Canal. There has been considerable discussion as to that convention, because it is referred to in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as the basis of certain articles in that treaty, and therefore it becomes of paramount importance. Strange to say, it has been assumed in this debate that the position of Great Britain with regard to the Suez Canal is the same as that of the United States with regard to the Panama Canal.

Great Britain did not construct the Suez Canal. Great Britain does not own the Suez Canal. She owns 176,000 shares out of the 400,000 shares in a stock company which does own and operate the canal. Under the charter of this company the voting power of any one stockholder is limited to 10 votes, so that Great Britain is entitled to only 10 votes out of 16,000 votes in the Maritime Canal Co., which owns the Suez Canal. Under the articles of association every 25 shares are entitled to 1 vote, but with the limitation of 10 votes to any one shareholder Great Britain has only 10 votes out of 16,000.

That is her sole interest of law and right in the Suez Canal; and yet she has assumed authority in regard to the Suez Canal, and undertakes here to claim that under these wholly different conditions the principles which have been adopted by a number of nations there which had no legal power or right whatever to make any regulations in regard to the Suez Canal should govern the United States Government, which owns not only the Panama Canal, the waterway itself, but a strip of dry land 5 miles wide upon each side of it, and is the exclusive sovereign of that territory, and makes the claim that the United States can have no greater rights than Great Britain, which is a minor stockholder and a small share voter, has in the Suez Canal, or, for that matter, no greater right than any one of the treaty powers have therein.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to say that Great Britain has only a minority stock holding in the Suez Canal Co.?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is all. She has only a very small minority vote in the Suez Canal Co. There are 400,000 shares. Great Britain owns 176,000 shares. Under the articles of association, as they are called, which govern the company, each 25 shares is entitled to 1 vote, but no one shareholder can have more than 10 votes; so Great Britain is limited to 10 votes out of 16,000 votes.

Mr. BORAH. Has she observed that rule?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose she observes it, but constantly violates it.

Mr. BORAH. I had understood that she controlled the majority of stock. That is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. She does not control the majority of stock. She controls the canal.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it true that with her stock and other stock owned by citizens of Great Britain she has a control?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is unknown.

Mr. NORRIS. I have understood that was the fact. I have assumed that was true. I have read it a good many times.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have here a statement in regard to that matter from most excellent authority, Col. Sir Howard Vincent, who is a very prominent business man in England, who made a study of the Suez Canal for the purpose of making this address before the London Chamber of Commerce on the subject. All that he says in regard to English stockholders is, after a most thorough discussion of the entire management of the canal and Great Britain's interest in it, that the presumption is that the citizens of Great Britain are well represented among the shareholders. Even if they were, however, the fact that private, individual citizens of Great Britain own stock in the Suez Canal would not give to the Government of Great Britain authority to control it.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no, no.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It would be an important circumstance, of course.

Let us compare for an instant the situation at Panama and the situation at Suez.

At Panama the United States owns the territory, and has constructed the canal. Sir Edward Grey says that there were certain rights reserved at Suez to Turkey, and to Egypt within the limits of her autonomy, because they are sovereigns. While sovereigns, however, they lack that most important interest which the United States has in being the owner of the canal itself. They are sovereigns over the country in which the canal is situated, but neither Turkey nor Egypt is the owner of the canal. Neither Turkey nor Egypt expended a dollar in its construction. Great Britain never expended a dollar in its construction.

Under those conditions it is agreed between the countries I have named that the agents of all of them shall gather at stated intervals to observe whether or not the convention of 1888 is being carried out and enforced. How preposterous it would be for anyone to propose that the representatives of foreign powers should gather periodically at Panama to observe whether or not these rules were being enforced. Yet that is what could be done if the Panama Canal is to be put upon the same basis as the Suez Canal.

Great Britain, long before the convention of 1888, assuming an authority which she had acquired by force of arms through bombarding the peaceful city of Alexandria, making war upon Arabi Pasha, following it up by an attack upon the Mahdi and his followers in the Sudan, had undertaken to close completely the Suez Canal with her gunboats stationed at each end of it, and shut out the traffic of every nation on earth, although she was merely the minority stockholder I have mentioned, and had no other interest in it. Even as late as 1898—I suppose she did it as an act of friendship for the United States, or claimed that she did, but it was really an act of friendship for Spain—she refused to let the Spanish fleet go through the Suez Canal in order to attack the American fleet in the Philippines. She had no right to do that. It was purely an assumption on the part of Great Britain. Not only by the convention of 1854 but by the more formal one of 1888, in the specific convention terms which have been read here so often, the right of Spain to have her vessels pass through that canal was as clear as the title to any property or any right possibly could be. Great Britain nevertheless refused, with the predominant influence which she had there, to allow the Spanish vessels to pass through.

As throwing some light not only upon the so-called neutralization of the Suez Canal but upon the meaning of neutralization generally, and also as applied to the Panama Canal, it is interesting to read some expressions of authorized English statesmen when the Suez-Constantinople convention of 1888 was being negotiated among the nations which were parties to it. It is quite interesting.

On August 19, 1887, the Marquis of Salisbury wrote to Monsieur Waddington, the British representative at Paris, in regard to these stipulations. Speaking of the dangers which were to be avoided to the interests of the various countries in the Suez Canal he says:

These dangers may practically be divided into those which may arise from local disturbances and any attack which might proceed from one of the great European powers who are to be the signatories to this convention.

In regard to this latter danger—

That is, the danger of an attack by a great European power, notwithstanding it was a signatory to the convention—far the more formidable of the two, I am glad to note that the course of discussion has brought us into accord. You admit in your letter under reply that in such a case the convention would be "qu'une feuille de papier sans valeur." This view does not perceptibly differ from that which I suggested in my letter of the 18th ultimo, when I said that in the case supposed "the convention would be broken and annulled and all parties would resume their natural liberty."

* * * * * * *

It is obvious, however, that this question links itself closely with the definition of that which your excellency has designated as the region of the canal, a definition which, in the letter under reply, you invite me to discuss.

The restriction in question assumes a very different aspect if we interpret the word "canal," as your excellency seems inclined to do, to mean not only the portion of land covered by water, but a border of dry land upon each side. If there is to be on each side of the canal a space of greater or less width, to which the stipulations we are now considering are to apply, very serious difficulties will arise.

These spaces must be subject to a kind of neutralization fundamentally different from that which is to be provided for the real canal. If the formula is applied to them, that they are to be "open to all powers at all times," it is obvious that they will become rather common ground than neutral territory. Any power will be at liberty to place whatever amount of military force it pleases upon them at any time. On the other hand, if neutralization in its more ordinary sense is applied to them, and, instead of any power at any time being allowed to pass through them, it is provided that no power at any time shall do so, it is obvious that a band of territory will be marked out within the dominions of the Sultan which he will not be at liberty to enter, even at the request of the khedive, but which will be singularly at the mercy of a local insurrectionary movement, if any such should arise.

Mr. BORAH. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. POINDEXTER. August 19, 1887.

Mr. BORAH. At the time the Marquis of Salisbury wrote that letter it was some 10 or 15 years before the new definition of neutralization had been adopted to meet this situation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Eminently so, and that is a very pertinent suggestion of the Senator from Idaho. I would like the Senate to apply the very clear and common sense views which the Marquis of Salisbury took of the condition, which is identical with the actual situation at Panama where we are the sovereigns of the strip of dry land on each side of the canal, and where Great Britain is attempting now through Sir Erward Grey to apply to it a definition of neutralization which created the situation which Lord Salisbury says would result in a great deal of difficulty.

Mr. BORAH. Of course it would be impossible to say that the word "neutralization" was never used in the sense of equality of tolls prior to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but I have gone through the English authors and I have investigated to a considerable extent the manner in which that term has been used by English writers and English statesmen, and the first instance I can find where the word "neutralization" was used as synonymous with equality of tolls or equality of charges was in Sir Edward Grey's letter, which the Senator referred to a short time ago. Prior to that time it was always used in the sense they are using it there, as neutral territory applying to a condition of war. Never before have I been able to find where they used it in the sense in which it is now used in this discussion by some as applied to equality of charges or equality of tolls.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that that is the only word that they have upon which they can predicate their theory, and they are as wrong as the Senator from Idaho describes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Lord Salisbury continues:

In fact, if such a stretch of land should be closed to the sovereign of the territory in which it is placed, it will be in a position for which no precedent in international law or practice can be found. It will be part of the Ottoman Empire, under the sanction of the treaty of Paris, but the Sultan will be forbidden to exercise on it any rights of sovereignty or suzerainty. It can not be expected that the Porte will accept such a proposal.

Yet it is expected and demanded that the great United States will accept such a proposal, and that this strip of dry land and the canal itself shall be deprived of its national character and become international through a perverted definition of the word "neutralization."

Mr. President, there is not a word in the articles of the Suez convention which provides for equal tolls. Whatever is the law requiring charges in the Suez Canal to be the same to all nations—and none of them occupy a position with regard to it that the United States occupies with reference to the Panama Canal—it is not found in the articles of the Suez convention, but is found in the concession which the Khedive granted to the Maritime Canal Co., which constructed it.

Mr. BORAH. That concession excepted the sovereign authority over the canal from the operation of that equality of charges, did it not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Entirely so.

Furthermore, although not expending any money in the construction of the canal, in granting this concession Egypt reserved to itself 15 per cent of the gross proceeds of the canal, which would be far more than Egypt, even if she had ships passing through the canal and had commerce, would be required to pay in tolls.

Mr. President, the proposition is so preposterous that if the situation which exists in this canal and the rights governing it had been presented to the Senate of the United States in the form of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to be applicable to them, I doubt whether it would have received the vote of a single Senator. No American would ever have dreamed that the United States, having become sovereign of the territory and having bought the partially constructed canal, should become involved in the articles of the Suez Canal convention, confining ourselves to the same privileges and rights enjoyed by nations which did not pretend to have ever expended any effort or any money in the construction of that canal, and none of whom, with the exception of Great Britain, were even stockholders in it.

That reminds me of what I had overlooked before, that not only did Egypt, expending no money on the Suez Canal, retain 15 per cent of the gross proceeds, but retained or received in pursuance of her concession 176,000 shares of the capital stock, which Great Britain now owns, which, because of the financial difficulties of the Khedive, he afterwards parted with and sold to Great Britain.

That was the situation with reference to the little country of Egypt in the Suez Canal—not only acquiring almost half of the stock and entitled to the dividends upon that stock, but, in addition to that, receiving 15 per cent of the gross proceeds—expending nothing, reserving every right of sovereignty, while the United States, expending everything, is supposed to operate this canal for tolls which represent the actual cost of operation and is to be bound to give to its citizens no greater rights than every other country in the world may have.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If this were a proposition to vote the money to build a canal across the Isthmus of Panama in the light of the construction placed upon the treaty, I assert that there would not be a dozen men in this Chamber who would vote a dollar to build it on that theory, and the American people would not sustain it for a moment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no question about that, Mr. President. I do not want to use strong language, but if, having been induced through their representatives to consent to this vast expenditure for the construction of this canal, they are now, through finespun technicalities of the construction of treaties and upon what are called principles of generosity toward the claims of a country which can afford no example of generosity in its diplomatic history, the American people are deprived of the full benefit of this canal, it will be the perpetration of an outrage upon a great people.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The reason why I made the statement I did a moment ago was because I was one of the men who voted the original money to build this canal, and we had some difficulty even then in getting the appropriations to build it. It was a matter of controversy extending over a long period, but it never would have been done in the world upon any theory that the Government of the United States would build it, maintain it, defend it, and yet have no more interest in it than a country that did not contribute a penny toward it and gained by reason of its construction a thousand fold more by that fact than our own country.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And was not made responsible for it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; that had no responsibility at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am glad to have that view stated by the Senator who took part in the ratification of those treaties, and I will add to it the statement that in my judgment if that construction of these treaties is to prevail, and I say it in all candor and good faith, it would be a good business proposition for the United States to-day to surrender the canal and put the cost of its maintenance, and its operation, and its protection upon Great Britain and take our stand under the claim of equal rights in the canal under the treaty in the position which Great Britain now occupies.

Now, reverting to the Suez Canal, which is the parallel sought to be made to the Panama Canal and in respect to the international rights, bearing in mind the acts and authority which Great Britain has committed in reference to it, closing it to the vessels of all nations, excluding the warships of Spain, let us see who are the real owners of the canal.

They were nearly all—

Says this author, Sir Howard Vincent—

as Lord Palmerston contemptuously said, "small people"—

That reminds me that Great Britain, although now controlling the Suez Canal, did everything she could in the first place to prevent its construction, threw every obstacle that the British Government could in the path of Ferdinand De Lesseps in that great undertaking—

They were nearly all, as Lord Palmerston contemptuously said, "small people," but not quite within his description of "Café waiters deceived by the newspapers lying on the tables, or grocers and dry-goods assistants entrapped by the paper in which they wrapped their wares." Only 369 were bankers and brokers, while clergymen numbered 480; schoolmasters, 434; doctors, 433; lawyers, 819; and workmen and mechanics, 910.

Those were the owners of the Suez Canal. Those were the people whose money constructed it. Yet Great Britain says that we must enjoy in the Panama Canal, constructed solely by our Government, no more rights than the nations of Europe enjoy in the Suez Canal.

The French people organized a committee of defence of their company against the aggressions of Great Britain, which aggressions finally accomplished her purpose to dominate and control the great canal at Suez. It was called a committee of defence of the Suez Canal, and it is most significant and interesting that the stockholders of the company were compelled to take proceedings of that kind. This author proceeds, and it is perfectly pertinent and applicable to the present situation:

It has been necessary to enter into some detail to give a clear account of these matters, as in some quarters an idea seems to prevail that the canal was dropped from heaven for the benefit of England.

That idea is pretty prevalent through the Senate of the United States as well as in Great Britain.

Furthermore, Mr. President, not only did the Egyptian Government, expending nothing on the Suez Canal, retain 176,000 shares of the stock out of 400,000 shares and 15 per cent of the gross proceeds, but, more important than either of those, she retained the reversion of the canal at the end of 99 years. At the time that this address to the London Chamber of Commerce was made in 1905, in summing up his conclusions Col. Vincent said:

That under present arrangements the British Government—the British Government is undoubtedly trustee for Egypt and the Egyptian people, who in 64 years come into this vast property and everything appertaining to it.

They will own the canal absolutely, after having enjoyed the stock and 15 per cent of the gross proceeds since it began its operation. At the end of 64 years the privilege of the Suez Canal Co. will be terminated, and Egypt, in the hollow of Great Britain's hand, will become the absolute owner and exclusive master of the canal. That is what Egypt got out of the Suez Canal. Yet it is said here that we must build our canal exclusively and bear the entire burden of its operation, and yet enjoy no greater commercial advantage in it than England or any other nation.

Now, Mr. President, what is the attitude of Great Britain with reference to her domestic commerce passing through the Suez Canal? Great Britain says that as to the Panama Canal we have no right to exempt from tolls our coastwise shipping. She says that we have no right to reimburse our coastwise shipping for the tolls which they would be required to pay if this bill passes, in passing through the canal, because that would be merely an evasion of the treaty and would be in effect an exemption.

There are so many preposterous propositions about this matter that it is difficult to discuss it in moderation. What I have said and am saying in regard to it, I feel more applicable to our foreign trade. It seems to me, from a common-sense view of the situation, that it will not be necessary to say a word in regard to our coastwise trade, although that at the present time is the only thing that is involved. The only contention that is being made is that the ships of both countries should be put upon an equal footing. There is nothing in this law as it stands now which interferes with that principle of equality as to ships of both countries. If there is a British ship that engages in our coastwise trade it would be exempt under the terms of this law. It is not the canal act that makes a discrimination between the ships abroad and the ships of the United States. The Panama Canal act, as I recollect it, does not say that the United States ships engaged in domestic commerce passing through the canal shall be exempt from tolls. It says that all ships engaged in our coastwise shipping passing through the canal shall be exempt.

Mr. NORRIS. Foreign ships can not engage in coastwise shipping.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Foreign ships could engage in coastwise shipping if we modified our shipping laws.

Mr. NORRIS. We would have to change our law.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We would not have to change the Panama Canal act.

Mr NORRIS. No.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Panama Canal act would stand just as it is now. It is not it that discriminates against the shipping of Great Britain in this matter, but it is the law which confines our coastwise shipping to our own ships. Great Britain has the same law as to her ships, and it is that law which has given her the maritime mastery of the sea. The importance of the Panama Canal to Great Britain is that she is the mistress of the world's trade. She became so when she revived her drooping commerce and took it from the ships of Holland by the passage of the great navigation act of 1651, in which she excluded Holland and every foreign country from participation in her coastwise or her colonial trade. Immediately her shipping increased, and from that time to this it has grown, and it is that act more than any other which has piled up in the British Isles the greatest wealth that any similar territory of the world has ever seen. And yet because we adopt the same policy as to our coastwise shipping and confine it to our own ships she protests, and by a quibble, by an equivocation, seeks to escape the effect of it by claiming that it is due to a discrimination in the Panama Canal.

I was proceeding to discuss, Mr. President, the British shipping in the Suez Canal. I will show later on just what they have done. On page 19 Col. Howard Vincent says—this is quite interesting as showing what Great Britain has gotten out of the Suez Canal—

To-day the market value of these 176,602 shares exceeds £32,000,000.

Great Britain taking advantage of the straitened circumstances of the more or less profligate Khedive of Egypt, by acting quickly in the masterly way in which many of her statesmen have acted, without waiting to consult Parliament, entered into negotiations with him and paid him £4,000,000 for the interest which Egypt had retained in the Suez Canal. That £4,000,000 had grown in 1905 through the appreciation of the value of those shares to £32,000,000.

In addition they—

have received over £12,000,000 in interest and dividends. The whole purchase price having been thus reimbursed threefold to the British public, really by the dues paid by British ships, it seems to me that after allowing, say, 10 per cent per annum upon the outlay thereon, the balance should be applied either for the benefit of British shipping as a whole, by the remission of light dues or some other impost, or else for the benefit of the British ships earning this source of national income by a reimbursement of, say, 2 francs a ton.

Lewis Nixon, in Monthly Bulletin of New York State Chamber of Commerce, says:

Why not discuss the question if such discussion be enlightening? Other nations do directly rebate Suez Canal tolls, and the committee must know it and know, too, that the subsidies which it tries to make general are in most cases directly voted to equalize such tolls. So why run away from the issue, or must we only provide a free feast of commerce to which all the world is bidden to partake at our expense?

The Russian Government in 1909 appropriated 650,000 rubles in exact terms to pay the tolls of the merchant steamers of the Russian volunteer fleet, both for tonnage and for all men, women, and children carried.

The British P. & O. Co. receives in subsidies enough to nearly pay all its canal dues, although it operates through the canal a number of boats apart from the mail steamers.

The North German Lloyd receives an annual subsidy on its vessels using the canal of $1,385,000. Japan pays a subsidy of $1,336,947 to the Nippon Yusen Kaisha for its steamers through the Suez to Europe.

The Massageries Maritimes, the largest French company using the Suez Canal, was paid for its lines to China, Japan, Australia, and Madagascar $2,145,000 in subsidies.

Austria specifically provides by law for payment of Suez tolls on Austrian steamers from Trieste to Bombay, Calcutta, and Kobe.

The Swedish Government calculates its subvention to the Svenska Ostasiatiska Kompaniet to represent the amount of tolls paid by the ships of the company for passing the Suez Canal.

However, since the committee seems to draw comfort and inspiration from the utterances of the Commissioner of Navigation, I will quote him further: "A deliberate conclusion to tax directly American shipping to pay for the maintenance of that canal when no tolls are imposed on vessels, American or foreign, for the use of our other improved highways, will be well-nigh inexplicable save as the definite surrender of the oceans to others by the United States except as we may use its waters from time to time for the maneuvers of our war fleets.

If the same propositions were made to-day by Great Britain as to her ships passing through the Panama Canal, or which will pass through the Panama Canal, that Great Britain should reimburse those ships the amount that they had paid for tolls at Panama, would we protest? I apprehend not. I apprehend we would have no ground to object. I can scarcely conceive that we would be so unreasonable as to assume an attitude which is manifestly untenable. If Great Britain can do that, why can not the United States, which is the proprietor of the canal, do the same thing? As Great Britain herself has said that would be equivalent, in another form, to the exemption of tolls, how does it change the substance of the matter if we pay the tolls into the Treasury before the ships go through the canal or if we pay the tolls after the ships go through the canal to the ships? There is no difference in principle. Great Britain can do it; why not we? Of course we can. Yet it is claimed by Great Britain and by the President of the United States that we can not; that is, it is now claimed by Great Britain that we can not, though it has been admitted by Great Britain officially that we can. I have a statement dated at Kineo, Me., British embassy, July 8, 1912. The Senate is more or less familiar with it, but I desire to read a few lines from it. It is from Mr. Innes. It is no more important than the views of another man as an individual expression, but it is of paramount importance as the official declaration of the British embassy in official negotiations with the United States in regard to this identical question. He says:

As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for United States vessels, would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

How does Mr. Innes, how does Sir Edward Grey, know that it would not be so regulated? No man can tell until the event. That is a matter of administration. It can not be dealt with until it arises. The law does not provide for the exemption of anything except vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. Whether it is practicable to enforce the law remains to be seen. Here is the official declaration that, so far as the law is concerned, the British Government may not have any objection to it.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, Great Britain had ceased to object upon this ground after the exchange of notes between Great Britain and the United States. As it has been pointed out very often here, the controversy was revived by a distinguished Senator upon this floor, who at the same time is a member of the executive committee of the Carnegie Peace Board, which has never slept nor rested in the campaign, which it has persisted in after the officials of Great Britain had abandoned it, to deprive the United States of its national rights and privileges in this canal and to fix upon it an international character.

I want to call attention to some of the minutes of that peace board. Of course its inspiration comes from Andrew Carnegie. He is a man who in many phases of his career is entitled to the greatest admiration. It would be unfortunate if anyone should envy him his great success. What I object to is not Mr. Carnegie or what Mr. Carnegie does, so long as he attends to his own business and confines his activities in legitimate channels; but I do object when he uses $500,000,000 and the power that that represents, acquired in the manner that it has been acquired—from the toil and the privation of American citizens—to oppose an American policy, and in the devious and insidious ways which wealth can command applies a powerful influence in behalf of a foreign country, and to give a foreign construction which is unwarranted by this treaty. The controversy was closed. This great power, always awake, always active, took it up. Here are some of the proceedings:

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, in view of the various remarks which have been made about the report on the Panama Canal bill, I wish to say that in my opinion the bill, with regard to the remission of tolls on American vessels, is in violation of our treaty with Great Britain, and I shall take occasion at an appropriate time hereafter to give my reasons for that belief. * * *

Mr. ROOT. * * * I feel very reluctant to make an argument regarding the rights of the United States under the treaty which have already come into diplomatic discussion. I feel the more reluctant because the view I entertain would require me to argue against the position which the Government of the United States may be bound to take if the opinion of the Senate should agree with the opinion of the House and this provision should be enacted into law.

The event was as he anticipated. The opinion of the Senate was the same as the opinion of the other House, the same as the opinion of the President and of the Attorney General, the same as the opinion of the country; and the question was settled. These questions involving human differences of opinion must be settled somewhere by human agencies. You can not remove the differences of opinion, but a self-governing people, capable of conducting a great nation, must recognize some authority which finally settles it. What higher authority could there be in the American Nation than its Congress and its executive department? All of the avenues of further presentation of the question to the Supreme Court which were open then remain open now if there has been a violation of any international right.

In part 63, page 4819, Hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary, August 7, 1912, appears the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 7, 1912.

DEAR ADMIRAL BOWLES: Soon after my letter of the 31st ultimo the President sent for Representative KNOWLAND and others in accord with him, and they had a conference with the President, at which conference Secretary Stimson was present. The President explained that Mr. Stimson was very anxious to have the entire matter go over until the next session. Mr. KNOWLAND and his associates promptly informed the President that they would not agree to any such arrangement. * * *

* * * Some little progress was made on the bill in the Senate on yesterday, as you will see by extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD herewith inclosed, which also contains the message of the President urging action at this session. At the time that he sent for KNOWLAND and the others I think he was favorable to the delay but did not wish to so express himself.

Now he has seen the handwriting on the wall and is for prompt action. I understand that Senator ROOT, who was the one who prompted Stimson to ask for delay, is against free tolls, while Senator O'GORMAN, of New York, is for free tolls, and if the bill goes through, therefore, it will perhaps serve to embarrass ROOT with the people.

Very truly, yours,

CLARENCE W. DE KNIGHT.

The note of Sir Edward Grey dated November 14, 1912, was handed to the Secretary of State December 9, 1912, and published in the press December 10, 1912.

The Carnegie endowment for international peace is controlled by a board of trustees presided over by President ELIHU ROOT and includes among its members Senators BURTON and WILLIAMS (pt. 62, p. 4772). Appropriations of money are allotted to specific purposes by the executive committee, consisting of Messrs. Root, Scott, Butler, Fox, Montague, Pritchett, and Tower (p. 4773).

Two days after the publication of the British note the board of trustees of this institute held a meeting.

[Extracts from the minutes of Dec. 12, 1912.]

Miscellaneous business was next announced in order, and the board discussed at length the attitude which the endowment should assume with reference to the Panama Canal toll dispute between the United States and Great Britain. * * * The board reconvened pursuant to adjournment and resumed the discussion of the Panama toll question. At the conclusion of the discussion the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That a committee of five, of which the president of the board [Mr. ROOT] shall be chairman, be appointed by the chair to prepare a brief statement concerning the present discussion between the parties of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to be signed individually by members of the board and published."

The chairman appointed on the committee Mr. Butler, Mr. Cadwalader, Mr. Choate, Mr. Eliot, and Mr. Root, upon the adoption of the foregoing resolution. The advisability of having this committee report to the board was considered, and the following resolution adopted:

"Resolved, That when the committee which has been authorized and appointed has agreed upon a paper, a meeting of the board be called, to which the committee shall report."

On January 14, 1913, as appears from page 1482 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a bill (S. 8114) to prevent discrimination in Panama Canal tolls was introduced by Mr. ROOT and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

On January 17, 1913, Secretary Knox replied to Sir Edward Grey's note.

On January 21, 1913, Senator ROOT made his speech in the Senate.

At a meeting of the executive committee of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, February 7, 1913, the following appears:

Mr. Eliot then read to the committee a statement which he had drafted as a member of the subcommittee of the committee appointed by the board of trustees on December 12, 1912, to prepare a statement concerning the present discussion between the parties to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The committee discussed the advisability of issuing the statement in view of the present state of the negotiations, but concluded so to do, and adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the statement read to the committee by Mr. Eliot be printed and sent to each member of the committee appointed by the board to consider the Panama Canal toll question and to each member of the executive committee with the request that any suggestions concerning its phraseology be sent to Mr. Eliot at the earliest possible date.

"Resolved further, That when the statement has been completed it be sent to each member of the board, with a request for his signature."

* * * * * * *

The secretary then presented the following resolution to provide for the distribution of Senator ROOT's speech and other literature on the Panama Canal toll question, which, upon motion duly made and seconded, was adopted:

"Resolved, That the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, allotted from the unallotted balance of the emergency appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, for the distribution of literature on the Panama toll question, and the treasurer is hereby authorized to disburse the said sum accordingly."

* * * * * * *

The following report was submitted by the secretary on the distribution of the statement issued by the trustees of the endowment on March 15, 1913, concerning the exemption of American vessels from the payment of tolls on the Panama Canal:

He recommended the further distribution of approximately 1,200,000 copies of the statement to the following selected lists of persons throughout the country and submitted an estimate of $19,000 to defray the cost of such distribution.

The committee concurred in the recommendation and adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the allotment of $6,000, made February 7, 1913, for the distribution of literature on the Panama toll question, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $25,000, and the treasurer is hereby authorized to disburse the said sum accordingly."

(Extracts from the minutes of the meeting of the executive committee of June 28, 1913.)

The following resolution, requested by the acting director of the division of intercourse and education, was also adopted by the committee:

"Resolved, That the sum of $7,469.40, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, allotted from the appropriation for the division of intercourse and education for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, for work of propaganda on the question of the Panama Canal tolls."

Mr. President, what interest has the Carnegie Peace Society in the Panama Canal tolls controversy? Is the question of peace or war involved? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], while giving a very striking picture here of a Quixotic Ajax defying an imaginary lightning, said that no nation on earth would think of going to war about this question of tolls in the Panama Canal. I apprehend that nations might think of going to war about it if other nations than those which are concerned were the principal parties to the controversy; but no nation will think of going to war with the United States about this question. There is not any danger of war; the question of peace and war is not involved; and why should the Carnegie Peace Society be pouring out the contents of its golden treasury in this propaganda against an American canal? One reason is that Andrew Carnegie is a British subject, registered as a voter in Great Britain. In the parish of Dornoch, in the county of Sutherland, you will find his name and the name of his secretary among the legal voters of Great Britain. You will find that he is an advocate of coalition between nations. He has made the title of one of his books "The Empire of Business." That is the only empire that he cares about. I hate to say anything about him, and I would not say anything about him if he would not, with the proceeds of his watered stock, meddle in this question. Of course, as an individual, he has a right to take part, but he is exerting more than the influence and the power of an individual; $500,000,000 becomes an international force. He believes that trade follows the flag, but he is like, it is said, the Ratner Bros. in Mexico—he does not care which flag.

The Ratner Bros. are American citizens, but they are supplying arms and munitions of war and friendly advice to Victoriana Huerta. I notice that some woman here in the city of Washington sent Huerta a locket placed in a receptacle of embroidered silk, bearing the name "Victoriana Huerta." You can excuse a woman for a thing of that kind. He may be mysteriously fascinating in some of his qualities; he has shown strength, if he has not shown virtue, and a woman, as a matter of sentiment, might send a locket to Victoriana Huerta and yet remain a good American citizen; but when it comes to men dealing in affairs of state it is a different proposition. They can not constantly live in an "empire of business," amidst the hard, metallic grinding of coin, and retain the fine flavor of patriotism which has made this a great people. That is the influence which has taken up this question, after it had been abandoned by Great Britain, and is carrying it forward.

Does anybody suppose that the day of the Tory is gone? Does anybody suppose that there is not in our midst to-day the same element, the same kind of people who opposed Washington and his patriot Army among his fellow citizens when we were struggling for our independence? Of course there are Tories to-day, and they are at work, and they are working to internationalize the United States.

Why should a "peace society" be concerned about this question? Let them confine themselves to the statesmanship of peace treaties. There is no peace treaty concerned here. They have gotten a number of distinguished Senators upon the membership of their executive board, and far be it from me to criticize the personal judgment of any Senator who cares to act with them; that is a question for them to determine; but I find them advocating strange doctrines, including universal arbitration, and some of them go so far as to believe in an international army, applying to governments the same principle of trusts and combinations that is applied to business. They seek to wipe out international lines.

Why, Mr. President, there are some things that I would not arbitrate; there are some things that the American people would not arbitrate. They dislike war. Every good fighter will go a long way around to avoid a conflict, if he can do so honorably, but there are limits to that. They will not arbitrate national existence; they will not arbitrate national independence; they will not arbitrate a question which would merge in any degree whatever the sovereignty of the United States, gained at so much sacrifice, with the sovereignty of Great Britain. As much as they dislike war, if war were necessary, they would undertake it for independence and life and sacred honor; and yet this "peace society" would arbitrate all those questions and accept the award of the arbitrators upon them. It is not an American doctrine. The same un-American influences have furnished the fine hand that has kept this fight alive and pressed it forward.

Another influence is a set of men who have done great engineering work on the canal. They have made themselves immortal for all time as engineers, and have become so absorbed in the canal and their pride in the canal that they are insisting on every ship that goes through it paying tolls in order that it shall yield a financial return, and the canal be on the safe side of the ledger so far as its financial accounts are concerned. They seem to have a mistaken notion that you can make the canal pay for itself by taxing the very people who have already paid for it. They forget the distinction between an enterprise built for commercial purposes by private individuals and an enterprise built upon the broad lines of national policy by a great government.

There is a third interest that has combined with these, and that is the transportation interest of the country, the railroad companies. As was said by Lewis Nixon, in a letter filed with the Chamber of Commerce in New York a short time ago on this question, the interests which are opposing free passage of our coastwise ships through this canal are doing so because they know that as soon as the canal is opened under this law every shipyard in the United States will be ringing with the sounds of industry, building ships to engage in our domestic trade through it.

Mr. President, it is an elementary proposition that water transportation is the basic regulator of the cost of moving our freight. It ought not to be necessary to cite instances in order to make that clear. The great discrimination between certain cities upon our railroads—some have low rates, some high rates—is justified in many instances by the railroads because they claim that it is necessary to put their rates down in order to meet water competition.

I have some specific illustrations, which I want in just one word to cite, illustrating the effect of water competition upon freight rates. When you demonstrate the effect of water competition upon freight rates, you demonstrate the fact that every transcontinental railroad in the United States is interested in imposing tolls, tolls, tolls, upon every ship that goes through the Panama Canal. Every cent that is imposed is that much of a discrimination and that much of an influence; and I desire to call attention to the fact that it does not require any very great difference in rates in order to control the channels of trade. A slight discrimination, a little lower rate, will control the trade. For that reason I wish to call attention in a moment to the fact, and to point out the reasons for it, that if our ships are thrown into competition with the ships of England passing through this canal, England will capture our domestic coast trade, notwithstanding the tariff.

The policy of tolls was long ago abandoned. They have not been collected on the Erie Canal since 1882. I wish to cite this instance in the case of that canal, which is as clear as it can be as to the effect of free passage by a waterway upon freight rates.

In 1871 the rate on wheat from Chicago to Buffalo by rail was 31 cents a bushel. Water transportation came in about that time—at least, I have figures for that year all the way by water—by lake and by canal. Immediately the rate by water was 20.24 cents a bushel, a difference of 10.76 cents per bushel in favor of water transportation between Chicago and New York. Through the operation of this influence constantly reducing the rates, by 1912 the rate had come down—and, of course, the railroads were compelled to put down their rates—to 9.6 cents per bushel by rail, while the rate by water had come down to 5.57 cents per bushel, a difference of 4.03 cents per bushel in favor of the water route.

In 1890 wheat was shipped from St. Louis to Liverpool by two different routes—one by rail via New York and the other by water via New Orleans. That furnishes a perfectly clear, succinct comparison as to the effect of water transportation upon freight rates. In 1890 the rate from St. Louis to Liverpool by rail via New York was 21.48 cents per bushel. The rate from St. Louis to Liverpool by water via New Orleans was 14.33 cents a bushel, a difference of 7.05 cents per bushel in favor of the water route. In 1903, through the operation of the same forces, the rate had been cut down by rail via New York to 16.02 cents per bushel, and by water via New Orleans to 10 cents per bushel, a difference of 6.02 cents per bushel.

I shall not go into the citation of figures at this time to show what is the universally recognized fact, that from various causes we can not compete upon equal terms with Great Britain in the operation of ships. British ships plying from the ports of British Columbia in any trade in which they can compete with the American ships will get the trade, because they give lower rates; they employ cheaper labor; they are not subject to the same standards and regulations of operation that our own ships are. British ships plying from Great Britain through the Panama Canal to the Pacific coast will operate more cheaply than American ships plying from our Atlantic coast through the canal to the Pacific coast, for the same reasons which I have stated. If they are put upon equal terms, so far as the canal is concerned, the lower cost of operating the British ships, together with the lower cost of producing the merchandise in England, will give to England the trade and commerce of the Pacific coast, those great populous States which now buy their millions annually from the marts of New York and Boston and the other manufacturing towns of the Atlantic coast.

England can not get that trade now because of the transcontinental haul. She has to land her goods upon the Atlantic coast, and there they are subject to the same conditions as American goods, after having paid the cost of transportation across the Atlantic, as to the cost of transportation across the continent. If, however, we open the canal, with the cheaper water transportation with which the railroads can not compete, Great Britain will load her ships in England with the manufactured products of England, sail them through the canal to our Pacific ports, pay the tariff, and deliver them to the consumer at a lower rate than our Atlantic coast manufacturers can pay the cost of transportation from coast to coast by the more expensive American ships. That applies to the mighty trade, now domestic, which will then become foreign, imported by the Pacific coast States.

Let us reverse the consideration. One of the great exports of the Pacific coast is lumber. In 1911 the State of Washington produced 4,064,754,000 feet of lumber. The State of Oregon produced 1,803,698,000 feet. The State of California produced 1,207,561,000 feet; a total of 7,016,013,000 feet of lumber.

British Columbia is our great rival; and in the case of this lumber—which finds a market, much of it, on the Atlantic coast, a great deal of it because it is used for purposes for which no other adequate lumber is available—the ships of British Columbia, operated more cheaply, carrying similar foreign lumber, which is free of tariff charges, passing through the Panama Canal, will put our ships in the lumber trade out of business and capture the lumber trade of the Atlantic coast, which is now enjoyed by the great States of Washington, Oregon, and California.

The same thing is not true of some other products of the Pacific coast, such as apples, oranges, various other fruits, and wheat, which are produced in vast quantities on the Pacific coast, but which either, as in the case of wheat, are shipped mostly abroad rather than to the Atlantic coast markets of the United States, or, as in the case of fruits, are not produced in large quantities in British Columbia. That, however, involves another consideration.

For years, in fact ever since the Pacific coast was first occupied by the pioneers, who spent six months in crossing the plains with their ox wagons, taking up the land under the hardships of the wilderness, separated from their native country practically by the great intervening continent, they have been looking for this canal as a quick, cheap, easy connection between them and their mother States in the Mississippi Valley and upon the Atlantic coast. It is perfectly natural that, now that the obstacles to its construction have been overcome after 50 years of opposition by the railroad interests, and after the contest that was made to prevent the United States from fortifying the canal, which was finally won by the United States, they resent this last stand of the transportation monopoly to put burdens and costs upon our domestic commerce passing through the canal, thus lessening to the extent of every cent of those tolls the effect of the canal as a great band binding the Pacific States to the Atlantic States, and cementing in a material way the interests of the Union.

Thousands of tons of valuable fruit, for which the population of crowded cities in the East is famishing, rot upon the ground in the fertile irrigated valleys in California, Washington, and Oregon because the railroads have overdone the principle of levying upon the traffic all that the traffic would bear, and have levied upon it more than it would bear, and have made it unprofitable to ship that produce to the consuming public, who are willing, if they can get it, to pay a reasonable price for it.

Every dollar of tolls that may be levied upon our domestic commerce, if this bill passes, will be a dollar levied upon the fruit and upon the lumber and upon all the products of the Pacific coast which should find a market not only in the coast cities of the Atlantic, but in every town and hamlet that can be reached by waterway, from the Gulf of Mexico and the Atlantic and all the great rivers that empty into them. I do not mean that necessarily in all cases they would be transported up the rivers by water, but that the possibility of water transportation will hold down freight rates, as it has done upon the Columbia and upon the Missouri from the time the country was settled. It means a dollar upon every ton of freight going east or west, by rail or water, from one side of the Rocky Mountains to the other.

Mr. President, if this canal is given its full effect it will connect the navigable waters of the Columbia, and all the great territory which it drains, and whose transportation is regulated by its navigability, with the waters of the Missouri. It will be equivalent to a canal through the Rocky Mountains, because it will be possible for freight from the great inland empires of the Pacific slope to go down the rivers of that slope to the sea, through the canal, and up the Gulf of Mexico and the Mississippi River and all of its tributaries. So it is not a local question. As I had occasion to say once before in this debate, there never has been and there never will be a public improvement which is so universal in its commercial and material effects upon the Nation as the Panama Canal. Every part of the country is affected by it, even the towns in the heart of the Rocky Mountains.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] asked me here one day if Denver would be affected by it. Why, Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia knew the lifelong struggle which the present inhabitants of Denver have made to relieve themselves of the extortionate freight rate which is based upon rates from the East to San Francisco and from San Francisco back to Denver, he would not have asked me that question. Every city which can be reached through the Hudson, the Erie Canal, and the Great Lakes, including the great city from which comes my friend the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], has a direct and immediate interest in the free use for our domestic commerce of this great highway of transportation.

Chicago has dreams of becoming a seaport, and I have no doubt that with the increase of population and wealth and industry the time will come when it will have ship channels to the sea. I am told by contractors who worked upon the enlargement of the Erie Canal, in the expenditure of the $100,000,000 which the State of New York recently voted to enlarge that canal, that $40,000,000 more would have made it navigable for sea-going ships. It is unfortunate that it was not made so at that time, but the time will come when it will be enlarged and ships plying from Seattle and Portland and San Francisco and the cities which will grow up in Alaska, transporting the resources of those great, rich, new Territories which are needed by the people of Chicago, will sail through the Panama Canal and land their commerce upon the docks of the Chicago River.

Mr. President, the objection is made to the exemption from tolls of coastwise ships passing through the canal that it benefits a trust. I think I can settle that question with any reasonable man in five minutes. I will agree, and I think many Senators on this side will agree, to vote for a bill which will impose tolls on every trust-owned ship that goes through the canal. It seems absurd to say that, because the present law prohibits ships owned by trusts from going through the canal; and I say it only because the argument is made that exemption will benefit a trust.

When, however, did we come to the policy of regulating trusts by taxing all of the industry of the country? When did we adopt the policy of suppressing the Standard Oil Trust, for example, by levying a tax upon every person engaged in the oil business? Yet that is the result of the argument that we must levy tolls, which are nothing but a tax for a specific purpose, levied through the same governmental authority, on the same principle that any general tax is levied. We are confronted with the result that we must levy tolls upon all of our domestic commerce passing through the canal because, perchance, ships owned by a trust may go through it.

If the Senators who advocate this bill can stand upon that proposition before the people of this country, let them stand. The people of this country are intelligent, and they know that you can not excuse or justify a universal burden upon an essential element of their life, which transportation is, by saying that some ships owned by a trust might go through the canal without paying a tax. No ship owned by a trust can go through the Panama Canal.

Even if there were ships ready to go through the Panama Canal, by what authority and upon what information does anybody say that ships going through the Panama Canal are owned by a trust? What ships are going through the Panama Canal? Nobody knows. The same influences which obstructed the building of the canal and obstructed its fortification and are now fighting its free use by its own people, have obstructed, and, in many cases—some to my own knowledge—have prevented the financing of independent companies seeking to build and equip ship lines to engage in our domestic commerce through the canal. The railroad monopoly is intimately connected with the money monopoly called the Money Trust.

I recollect that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] argued in his speech that the rule which would govern rates through this canal would be "all that the traffic would bear," the maxim which the railroads have adopted. I have heard their experts swear in court, or at least before the Interstate Commerce Commission, that that was the only principle by which they were guided; that they looked into a business and found out the conditions of it and how much it would stand.

The Senator from Louisiana has been quite active in this matter—upon both sides of the question. Of course, he has the right to be on both sides of the question. I respect him and respect his opinion, whichever side he may be on. I think if a man has reason to change his views he ought to change them. The only difficulty about that is—and the same statement might be applied to most of his colleagues upon that side—that it creates some confusion in the minds of those who respect their views as to whether or not their views were sounder last year than they are this year.

The Senator from Louisiana, and I think others, have said that any exemption from tolls would not benefit the consumer, that the ship lines would absorb it, that they would levy on the traffic all it would bear, and he cast some animadversion upon those who, he said, sought to make political capital by attacking the railroads.

A number of Senators interested in this matter have attacked the railroads. As far as I am concerned, in whatever attacks I have made upon railroads I have endeavored to see that they were just and well informed.

There is no man who realizes the universal interests of the people in railroads any more than I do, but I have been free, in the great railroad abuses from which we have suffered—in some sections more than others—to express my opinion upon them. However, I am somewhat astounded to hear a Senator of the United States practically declaring that we must submit to that obnoxious policy of levying upon traffic "all that it will bear." That is what we have been fighting to free ourselves from, and to establish as the basis of rates not what a man can afford to pay, but what is reasonable for the railroad to receive. Notwithstanding the complacency with which Senators advocating the passage of this bill declare here in the Senate or elsewhere that we must supinely submit, notwithstanding the fact that they declare in favor of the perpetuation of that oppressive policy of extortionate rates, we will not submit to it whether this bill passes or not, and we will insist that the rates paid by rail and by water are subject to public regulation; and if competition does not produce reasonable reduction and a reasonable basis for their regulation, we will establish governmental commissions or enlarge the powers of those already existing which will see to it that reasonable rates both by rail and by water are enforced. That power is in the Government, and whether it is exercised or not, the country may conclude to exercise it at any time; and if it does, would it not be right that such a commission, in fixing rates through the canal for freight, should take into consideration and make allowance for the tolls which the shipowners have to pay?

Of course, the fundamental proposition is that water transportation is the basic regulator of freight rates, and that the freer from tolls and charges and obstructions our transportation is the cheaper the rates will be. We have spent millions of dollars in blowing out rocks at Hell Gate, in New York, and from the Columbia River, and in digging mud from the bottom of the Missouri. For what purpose? Not to make navigation possible. It was possible before. Those were navigable streams, but we have improved them in order to make navigation cheaper and easier.

Are we going to apply that policy to every harbor and every river in the United States and to reverse it when it comes to the greatest waterway of the Nation and the greatest in the world, and instead of trying to make it cheaper make it more expensive by levying charges and tolls upon our commerce which goes through it? We do not have to do it, because it has been demonstrated in the most conclusive manner and has been admitted by Great Britain that there is nothing in the treaty that compels us to do it.

To say that it is a wise policy seems to me as a reversal of every public regulation and attitude which the Government has ever taken upon that question. The policy of the Government has always been, as expressed in the Constitution, to relieve interstate commerce of charges and tariffs and to make it free. The theory upon which this great Federal Government was constructed was that we should build up a great domestic commerce among ourselves—develop our home markets—so there should be no charges and tariffs in trade between the States, that whatever tariff was necessary to be levied should not be levied upon our trade, domestic or export, but should be levied upon the import trade of the country. That has been the policy of the Government from the foundation, and to start now for the first time in the history of the Government to reverse it in the very heart and center of the transportation system of the continent is an astounding proposition.

The people will not rest under it, in my judgment. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], in his able speech in behalf of this bill, a part of which I heard, if I mistook him not, argued that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we could not exempt our domestic commerce, because it was a violation of the principles of the common law. That is a new application of the principles of the common law. The principles of the common law did not prevent Great Britain, by statute in 1651—at least they were not so precious to her that she could not change them by statute and give the exclusive monopoly of domestic commerce to her own ships. The principle of common law, as I have always understood it, if you are to apply the common law to a national and international question, is that each individual should use his own as he saw fit so long as he did not do injustice to another. I think one of the first things I learned in the law was the old maxim "Sic utere tuo ut non alienum laedas."

This canal belongs to us. Is there any principle of common law which would be obnoxious to using our own canal for our own benefit so long as we do no injustice or injury to anyone else? Certainly it is no injury to Great Britain, for with our own funds we have constructed a waterway for her vast commerce. The route of all her vessels to her possessions and to foreign countries in the west Pacific will be shortened by many thousands of miles of expensive travel.

But, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has said, international law is a domain of jurisprudence entirely separate and distinct from the common law; and I might add that questions of national policy are likewise so.

How has this matter been presented to us? In a strange way. It is said that we ought to repeal the law because of the opinion of foreign nations.

By the way, I have in my hand a statement issued by the board of trustees of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, in pursuance to the resolution I read a moment ago. Among the signers of it, I notice the name of Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge. I read the proceedings indicating the extent in which this endowment has concerned itself in this matter. Far be it from me to express an opinion as to whether or not the fact that Mr. Cleveland H. Dodge contributed $35,000 to the Democratic campaign fund had anything to do with the acuteness of the present issue. This is the exact language of the President:

> Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal.

That is one of the reasons advanced by the President of the United States in his short and strange message on this subject why Congress after having settled this matter should reverse its action whatever we may think about it; that is, I might paraphrase it that way, whatever differences of opinion we may have about it, because foreign opinion is against us. In other words, we must direct our policy even in this domestic matter of so much concern to our people not by our own judgment, not through the counsels of our own statesmen, not by opinions which may be formed here as to the law or the economics, not by our opinion of the treaty, not as to whether we are right or whether we are wrong, but because of foreign opinion on the question.

When Great Britain passed the navigation act of 1651, it was denounced by Holland and all the rest of Europe as being an outrage. She did not repeal it. It resulted in her control for centuries, and up until the present hour of the trade of the world. When in the history of the United States in any of the great affairs with which we have been compelled to deal in our short and simple story—in which "not once but twice the path of duty has been the path of glory"—have we paused to direct our action by the opinion of foreign countries?

Mr. President, even at the present time I want to call attention to another one of the current issues and to the opinion of foreign countries in regard to it. I see no indication of the administration changing its policy in order to suit that foreign opinion. I have in my hand a statement from the Literary

Digest, which is a responsible organ, of March 28, 1914, as follows:

The European press almost universally condemn President Wilson's handling of the Mexican problem.

He has not changed his way of handling it, though, on that account. I am not criticizing it at this time, nor saying that he ought to modify it. I am calling attention to the fact that he ignores foreign opinion apparently, which he has stated to us in his message on the tolls question of March 5, 1914, should govern our action. Continuing to read:

He is said to have tried to impose the standards of a civilized state upon an Indian Empire just as if he had gone into Central Africa and expected to find a condition of civilized order, or had visited Madagascar and lifted his hands in holy horror on witnessing the feuds and fights between clans of Hovas and Betsimisarakas. While the London Outlook thinks that he has complicated matters by lifting the embargo and speaks bitterly about it to the effect that "there has been nothing so cruelly immoral and so cynically cruel in the history of the world," other papers generously treat the President and his Secretary of State with more consideration, and charitably but pityingly put the mismanagement down to want of training and experience, or sheer ignorance of the condition of things south of the Rio Grande. The leading paper of Paris, the Temps, deplores the way in which French interests are being sacrificed in Mexico, but puts it all down to our President's "mistakes."

In the same publication of May 23 is a digest of German opinion which I presume we ought to obey upon this question:

Unqualified condemnation of President Wilson and his Secretary of State is dealt out by almost all of the leading papers of Berlin and the great German industrial centers. War has been begun without sufficient reason, on the pretext of the Tampico affair, we are told. Why did not Mr. Bryan put into practice his favorite theory of arbitration rather than rush hastily into what is sure to prove a bloody war, it is asked.

The Neueste Nachrichten (Leipzig) says:

No one can fail to detect the absurdity and lying hypocrisy of the United States in their propositions of peace and of arbitration, while at the same time on a trifling pretext they immediately take the "Big stick" in hand. This is the bankruptcy of their pacifism which ends in doing nothing but affix a mortal stigma on the peoples who refuse to do everything that England and the United States desire. While we may have little sympathy with Mexico, no one can hail with enthusiasm the policy of banditism pursued by the United States, whose sole aim is the possession of Mexico's oil wells.

That foreign denunciation has no effect on me, and I think little upon the average American citizen. I care nothing for it. I would prefer that our Nation and those who are responsible for its affairs should to our own country be true, and then let it "follow as the night the day" that they can not be false to any nation.

I would prefer that those standards of morality and conduct which have been worked out through a century and a quarter of trial—beginning in a death grapple for independence—our own ideas, our own standards and ethics, should guide our conduct rather than the opinion of Germany and France. And so they should guide our conduct with reference to the Panama Canal, notwithstanding the assertion in the President's message that we must yield to a hostile foreign opinion upon that question; a foreign opinion which, by the way, I have not seen nor heard, nor among all the advocates of repeal has it been presented upon this floor.

A new policy was advanced during his argument here by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I might call it a policy of politics to the water's edge. I had better read what he said:

We should determine what is right, without fear and without favor.

That is good. Then he goes on to say:

The allurements of political advantage appeal as strongly to me as they can to any man. But when the relations of my country with other nations are involved I can not yield to them. My politics have always stopped at the water's edge. In any question involving our international relations I have always felt compelled to decide it upon its merits as they appeared to me, without regard to politics.

In other words, we must walk on a high moral plane of merit and justice when we come to dealing with foreigners, and we may take every political advantage we can of our neighbors at home.

There was a man in our town who was said to "walk on a high moral plane, skinning everybody he could." That seems to be this new theory of politics clear up to the water's edge. No sincerity in dealing with our domestic questions, every possible political advantage to be taken, concealment of real opinions and real motives when it comes to dealing with our own people. But when it comes to the Britishers, for God's sake let us be honest with them. Let us be more than honest, says the President; let us be generous. He says:

We are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

Let me warn Senators, if they will pardon me for doing it, that what might be regarded as pathetic and pitiable in the surrender of a little nation of its rights to foreign aggression is very apt to be considered contemptible when done by a great and powerful nation; and that what might be regarded as generous, if we were dealing with a little Republic like Panama or Mexico, is very apt in the eyes of the world to be interpreted as fear when we are dealing with England, the mistress of the seas, who sits like a colossus on every strategic point of commerce around the world.

One strange thing, Mr. President, about the message of the President of the United States was that you could read it and you could hear it, but you failed to recognize from it that he had ever entertained a different opinion. The farmers of New Jersey hung upon the honey of his lips when he painted to them in his masterly rhetoric the advantages of a free canal. And who will gainsay that if he had advocated a different policy at that time and the platform upon which he was nominated had declared that our domestic shipping must pay tolls through this canal that he perhaps would not have had the power or position to bring this question to the front at this time?

When a candidate of a great party—and I say it with the utmost respect, and everything else that I say in regard to him is in that spirit—had expressed himself formerly in the campaign for the election upon one of the cardinal principles of his platform, and if within a little more than one year after he had been inaugurated into the office to which he was elected upon that platform he saw fit to convene the two Houses of Congress and to declare to them an opposite policy upon that question, one would think that he would have explained to Congress why he had changed.

Was Mr. Wilson less wise in 1912 than he is in 1914? Of course that was before the obligations and the complexities which come out of political campaigns and which follow the inauguration of a new party into office; but we have no reason to suppose that he was less informed, less capable of reaching a just conclusion in 1912 than he is in 1914. The presumption in favor of one is equally as strong as in favor of the other, "if not more so." So it becomes necessary, or ought to become necessary, that if the President declares in this formal manner a change from the policy of the candidate for the Presidency the burden would be upon him to give some convincing reason for a change. Yet he not only gives none but fails to mention the fact that he ever entertained a different opinion. It is strange, passing strange. Here we witness the Charge of the Political Light Brigade.

Was there a man dismayed?
Though every Senator knew some one had blundered,
Their's not to make reply,
Their's not to reason why,
Their's but to do and die.

Now, Mr. President, it was said that the platform was not binding—that is, that this plank of the platform was not binding. Of course, to deal with each plank of the platform in turn as they come I suppose some of them would be binding and some of them would not be binding; some of them were deliberately adopted, some inadvertently passed, some slipped in, some put in on purpose, varying in accordance with the exigencies of the occasion. I do not know of any other way of determining which ones slipped in and which ones did not slip in.

It is urged that this plank of the platform was not binding because when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], representing the committee on platform, read it to the convention there was so much noise and confusion in the convention hall that no one could hear a word that he said. Of course, if they could not hear a word that he said, they could not hear any part of the platform, and the whole platform would be abrogated by it.

We have been asserting conditions which practically abrogate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—but it had not occurred to us to urge, what I have no doubt was true, that when it was read to the Senate there was so much disorder in the Chamber it could not be heard by all the Senators.

Here is another plank in the platform that I will read:

The law pertaining to the civil service should be honestly and rightly (rigidly) enforced, to the end that merit and ability shall be the standard of appointment and promotion rather than service rendered to a political party.

This was adopted inadvertently during much noise and confusion and has not been binding on the party since the election.

We favor a single presidential term—

That is right in the middle of the platform—and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible for reelection, and we pledge the candidate of this convention to this principle.

I have not any doubt whatever that that kind of oozed in between the planks; I can see myself how it might be charged such a plank was only "to be relied on during the campaign"; and so the platform itself says it was not, but was likewise "to be kept when in office," and yet it may be discovered after all that it, like the tolls plank, is contrary to fundamental tenets of Democratic faith. Here is another one that must have gotten in by mistake:

We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law prohibiting any corporation from contributing to a campaign fund and any individual from contributing any amount above a reasonable maximum.

Of course, I do not know whether $35,000 from one man is "reasonable" or not. It may be that it was a trust or combination of men who contributed that amount and he acted as the syndicate representative. Anyway, we have not yet been able to determine: there has been no expression as to whether that plank is really in conflict with some other portion of the platform or not; it may be. It has been discovered, when there is a specific declaration in favor of exemption from tolls of domestic commerce between the States, that on account of there being a general provision in the platform against subsidies the special provision is of no effect. Of course, the rule of law is just the opposite of that; but that does not apply to this platform. Of course, the Democratic platform committee had no idea of the meaning of subsidies when they declared against them, and at the same time declared in favor of tolls exemption, and placed these two declarations not only in the platform but in juxtaposition in the platform.

It has been discovered since that time by many who desire this repeal that exemption from taxation is a subsidy. It was a long time before we had any income tax in this country. Exemption from income tax was a subsidy, I suppose, but we did not know it. We have an exemption now of a certain class of people from the operation of the income tax, who have an income of less than $4,000, and that I suppose is a subsidy. There are various forms and powers of taxation vested in the Government which are not exercised; but, according to this new definition of subsidy, every omission to tax the people with a stamp tax, or a capitation tax, or an inheritance tax, or a tax upon transportation, or a toll upon a road or in a canal, or in the shape of tonnage dues in a harbor, is a subsidy. If you allow a man to walk upon a street which is built and improved at public expense, he is obtaining a subsidy, although he does not know it. That is the theory upon which it is attempted to relieve the Democratic Party of the obligation of this plank in the platform.

But, Mr. President, the conditions now—and I must hurry to a conclusion—are the same as on August 8, 1912, when the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] made this declaration:

I am opposed to giving free passage through the canal in any event. I do not think it good policy. It is a very different proposition to extend free passage to the domestic trade and to broaden it to the foreign trade. The remission of tolls to ships in the domestic trade helps to regulate our transcontinental transportation by railroads; it benefits a far greater number of our people than would a like exemption in the case of the foreign trade. The number who derive the benefit is much less in the case of foreign trade. I do not, however, put it especially upon that ground; I put it especially upon the ground that I do not doubt the effect of such a course with reference to the final return of every dollar of tolls we collect from the vessels of other countries.

The people of this country, Mr. President, in their various homes, many of them out of touch with mediums of communication, yet whose opinions go to form the great body of public opinion, the wisest agency governing human action of which we know, long ago arrived at a conclusion upon this question without following the devious lines of legal argument and nice distinction as to the exact meaning of words about which even the men who framed these treaties differ.

The people have formed their opinions upon broad fundamental considerations. They have been taught to suppose that the law is founded upon justice. High terms have been used to define the wisdom and the justice of the law. It has been said that it is "a rule of action directing what is right, prohibiting what is wrong, enjoining the one and punishing the other." Bolingbroke declared that "of the law no less can be said than that its seat is the bosom of God, its voice the harmony of the world." Young lawyers starting out in their profession have been instructed by wise counselors to seek the very justice of a cause, and they would be apt to rest their feet upon the law. So our people in the instincts of justice and of righteous conduct, with a proper and decent self-respect, albeit a respect for their opponents, have been imbued in the very nature of this thing with the injustice, and consequently the probable illegality, of the British claim. I say that they would assume, without examining the documents, that it would hardly be unlawful that the United States, having constructed this work upon its own territory, should have the right of an owner to use it for the benefit of our own people so long as we deal equitably and justly and uniformly with foreign nations. Guided by those fundamental propositions, our people have arrived at the same conclusion that able and disinterested lawyers have arrived at after a minute and exhaustive examination of the documents and history of the case and a weighing of the particular words of the instrument.

England is acting like a Shylock. She is resting her case upon a narrow interpretation of certain words in the bond, and she demands that she shall have a part of the very heart and center of our system. Those men who acquired original holdings there, which became the basis of treaty negotiation, burned and plundered and ravished; and England held up her priestly hands in holy horror at their deeds; but she winked the other eye, and when they returned home some of them were made baronets and lieutenant governors of colonies. Wherever around the world a British commander—and there is no man who has more admiration for the fighting qualities of the British than have I, but I am an American, rather than British, and I can never forget the issues which have existed between us nor fail to oppose any infringement of our national rights by Great Britain—wherever her commanders upon some strategic point, like Hongkong, Gibraltar, the Straits Settlements, the plains of India, the ports of Egypt, have, even without authority and in violation of orders, seized a piece of land and hoisted the royal ensign above it, they have been supported and backed up by the British Government. So it is that she sits as mistress of all the great trade routes of the world. The English are great fighters; they are a race that has produced many heroes; and I am not one of those who believe that even yet she is a decadent nation.

How has she acquired this empire of the seas and the islands of the seas? By slow stages. First, probably by somebody on an exploring expedition, some trader among savage tribes. That is the germ. They usually have a gunboat fooling around in the vicinity; and out of that grows what might be called the embryo that they call "spheres of influence." You will find that marked upon the map of nearly every continent of the world—"spheres of influence," British spheres of influence. Out of "spheres of influence" grow protectorates, over the Mosquito Indians and others, and out of protectorates has grown the absolute sovereignty of the soil.

Let us beware, in view of the history of Great Britain and its results, her masterly diplomacy, and her record of victories won on land and sea, her record of continuous and masterly advance, her flag following her trade—not some foreign flag, but her flag and her ships—that we do not find here in the repeal of this clause—recognizing the contentions and claims of Great Britain to a voice in the disposition of rates in the Panama Canal—the foundation of another "sphere of influence," the beginning of another "protectorate," which it may tax our strength and treasure at some future time to destroy.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the following Senators, and to state that they are paired: The senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, several days ago I offered an amendment, which I believe is the pending question now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. After some consultation with quite a number of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, particularly with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I believe an understanding has been reached by which those who favor the kind of a proposition contained in my amendment can better unite upon an amendment which the Senator from North Carolina will offer. I therefore desire to withdraw my amendment and yield to the Senator from North Carolina to offer the substitute which he has.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska withdraws his amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, does it not require unanimous consent to withdraw an amendment that is pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think so. Any other Senator can reoffer it who wants to do so.

Mr. JONES. The matter is in the hands of the Senate, and it seems to me that it would require unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment, and I do not know that I myself am prepared to give unanimous consent for its withdrawal at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. Any Senator has a right to withdraw an amendment at any time before any action is taken on it by the Senate, or at least before any amendment is offered to it.

Mr. JONES. I doubt very much whether it can be withdrawn after it has been presented to the Senate and is in the hands of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that a Senator may withdraw an amendment when he chooses.

Mr. SIMMONS. I offer, as a substitute for the committee amendment, the amendment which I send to the desk, to take the place of the proviso in the bill as reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee, on page 2, section 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified the 18th of November, 1901, or otherwise, to exempt the vessels of the United States, or its citizens, from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal, or as in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaty, or otherwise, with respect to the sovereignty over or the ownership or control and management of said canal and the regulation of the conditions or charges of traffic through the same.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. He stated, in substance, that an arrangement had been effected by which his amendment would be withdrawn and the amendment presented by the Senator from North Carolina would be offered as a substitute. I want to ask him, lest it might be understood that it would be taken by general consent, with whom that arrangement was made?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no desire to intimate that it has been or should be taken by general consent. I had various conferences with various Senators on the subject of an amendment similar to the one I had offered. The Senator from North Carolina, who represented the committee, as I understand, or, at least, that portion of the committee favoring the pending bill, had various conferences with various Senators. I was only anxious that some amendment embracing the idea contained in the amendment which I had submitted should be adopted, and I agreed with the Senator from North Carolina that I would withdraw my amendment and yield the floor for the purpose of having him offer his amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. Then, as I understand, the only understanding was between the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not put it in that way. I am not claiming, however, that anyone is bound to support that amendment or to oppose an amendment to it or anything of that kind. I am not attempting to bind anyone. I have agreed to this arrangement because I have felt it would strengthen the likelihood of this idea, this principle, being put into the bill. I desire to preserve all our rights under the treaty, and I believe this amendment will fairly accomplish that fact.

Mr. REED. I merely wanted to have a clear understanding myself about it, and I am obliged to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey obtained the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator from Utah for a moment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, a few days ago, in speaking upon this bill, I had occasion to criticize the amendment which had been reported by the committee, generally known as the Simmons amendment. That amendment reads:

Provided, That neither the passage of this act nor anything therein contained shall be construed or held as waiving, impairing, or affecting any treaty or other right possessed by the United States.

I think that amendment was utterly meaningless. It was a transparent sham. The amendment which the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from North Carolina have now agreed upon is not quite so transparent, but it is a sham nevertheless. That proposed amendment reads:

That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain—

And so forth.

There is absolutely no assertion of any right on the part of the Government of the United States. It throws doubt upon any right by its very terms, the provisions being:

As a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have—

Of course the United States may have a right, and the use of the words "any right the United States may have" necessarily implies the converse that it may not have any right. I undertake to say that a majority of the Members of the Senate believe that the United States has an undoubted right to exempt its coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal, and, having that opinion about it, they owe it to the people of the United States to so declare and to declare in positive terms. I shall offer as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator to let the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be considered as denying or abridging the right of the United States to discriminate in favor of the ships of commerce of its citizens in respect of the conditions or charge of traffic which may be imposed for the use of the Panama Canal, but, on the contrary, such right is hereby reasserted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I offered my amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment. I want to inquire if it is competent to offer a substitute to a substitute? I make the point of order that it can not be done.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, yes; it can.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

Yesterday some of us were consulted about this proposed change, and I understood—and I am asking the Senator from North Carolina now for information—that the words "or sovereignty, ownership, or" were to be inserted just prior to the words "treaty rights" or "rights under any treaty" in his original amendment.

It seems to me the amendment proposed now goes somewhat further. It reads:

That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain ratified the 18th of November, 1901, or otherwise—

The words "or otherwise," I take it, meaning there or under the treaty with Panama——

Mr. SIMMONS. Or in any other way.

Mr. WILLIAMS (reading):

To exempt the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, there never has been any doubt about the right of the United States to exempt its own ships from the payment of tolls, provided it also exempted those of everybody else. The point involved is a point of discrimination, not a point of exempting——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I most respectfully rise to a point of order. I feel that I have the floor. I yielded for the presentation of an amendment, not for the discussion ad libitum of propositions that may end in froth, and I most respectfully ask——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, I shall not interfere with the claim of the Senator from New Jersey to the floor; but this question having been brought up, I thought it was of some importance to the people of the United States to understand it before it went any further.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Undoubtedly they will have ample time. The discussion will go on for days before it is either adopted or rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator thinks his speech is of higher importance, I will waive my place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I do not claim that I can bring any great amount of intelligence to this subject, which perhaps more than any other since I have been a Member of this body has been discussed and analyzed to an extent that has been quite remarkable. I can bring probably no information to this question; but I do feel, as a Senator from the little sovereign State of New Jersey, the home of the President of the United States, who has raised the question, that it is fitting and proper at least that I should assert myself as to where I stand, and why I stand in the attitude I do on this question.

Mr. President, I can not bring to this subject aught of legal knowledge, nor do I feel that there is any need of it. The Senate has been regaled with all knowledge in that direction. Two years ago, when the bill regulating the tolls was before the Senate, I was a most attentive listener to the debates. I also made some remarks on the bill and finally voted for the tolls as now existing. I confess, however, that even at that time it did not entirely meet my views. I wanted then, and I still want, to have the tolls bill grant free passage to American craft, both ocean and coastwise, and to have the rate for all the other nations of the world fixed at such a figure as shall give only enough return to maintain the physical condition of the canal, leaving the interest on the cost of construction as America's gift to the civilized world. No fair-minded nation on earth would dare protest against such a policy.

The splendid arguments of Senators on both sides of this question have been to me most illuminating and instructive. If I had had doubts, which I never had, they would have been completely dissipated by the discussions and arguments.

I was a delegate to the Baltimore convention. As a delegate, I voted to adopt the plank touching the matter of tolls in the Panama Canal. Later, on every hustings where I had the honor and privilege of speaking, I dwelt with all the earnestness of my nature upon the wisdom and justice of the policy declared in the platform of my party. I believed in it as ardently as ever a child believed the words that fell from its mother's lips.

Was I justified, Mr. President? Yes, answering my own question; for did not our standard bearer—Woodrow Wilson—reiterate and declare both the wisdom of the policy and its justice to the American people?

Further, it was my privilege to have conferred with the late Senator from Georgia, Mr. Bacon, on the subject; also former Senator Butler; also Hon. Hannis Taylor, who is deemed an authority on international subjects. All of these and many more authorities agreed not only as to our right, but insisted on the wisdom of resisting the repeal of this so-called tolls measure.

Aside from these verbally expressed opinions the voters at the polls have also ratified the plank declaring for exemption from tolls. The Democratic campaign textbook was placed in my hands and in the hands of every other stump speaker and in the hands of thousands of others. When handed to us we were bidden: "Now go forth and proclaim the true Democratic doctrine."

The textbook pressed with much force the justice and wisdom of this particular plank in our platform. To my mind it is most unfortunate and unfair now, after all this, to attempt to run away from the question and to disavow or disown this plank.

Mr. President, after most deliberate thought two years ago I voted for the present tolls bill, and I have heard no argument that has convinced me against the wisdom of my judgment at that time. To this day I declare myself as unalterably opposed to the repeal of this measure, and shall so vote.

I listened some weeks since to the exhaustive and instructive address of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], which carried with it particular force to me because of the Senator's identification in the Senate with the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. His conclusion that there was no legal or moral reason to demand from the United States the repeal of the act was to me most forceful and convincing; but his conclusion that since we were so big and so rich that we might be justified in granting this claim and demand of Great Britain brought to my mind the instance of an old fellow I knew, of eccentric tastes, who lived near a little country schoolhouse. Two or three times a year he would stand in his door and throw from $8 to $10 in quarters in the road for the delight of seeing the boys scramble for them. When asked why he did this, his response was: "Oh, I do this just to impress the kids." [Laughter.]

This, I feel, is about the only justification that has been offered by the Senators on the other side for the repeal of this bill. It is just to tickle Great Britain.

Further, Mr. President, I can not subscribe to the doctrine and expressions of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], in his address some weeks since, with reference to the platform. I believe in the platforms of our party. I believe in adopting platforms by nominating conventions, and when so adopted they are the creed of our party. To me politics is a religion. I believe in it and in the policies I advocate.

I was a delegate to the Baltimore convention and to four previous presidential conventions. In the campaigns following each of these conventions I pressed the claims of our party with all the earnestness, fidelity, and zeal of my nature. I believed in the platform; and, Mr. President, I would hesitate—I would be ashamed—to face my fellow citizens now and repudiate the words and the platform I then pressed. No; a thousand noes. Though I shall stand alone in this body, I will vote "no."

Senators, my countrymen, I plead, do not take this step. Do not commit this wrong upon the country and the posterity that may come after us.

A kindly disposed friend writes me: "We think it best that you should be with the procession on this repeal measure." Now, just whom "we" may constitute I do not know, for his is the only name signed to the letter. Mr. President, I want to state in the Senate and to my countrymen that I deem it better—yes, best—that I should stand right. But do you ask me, "What is right?" for great minds in the Senate differ widely. In answer, "My conscience and intelligence, as God has given me reason to see it—this must be my guide. This course to me is safer and better to follow than that of any man, be he king or potentate on earth."

Mr. President, my relations with the President of the United States have been, and I feel still are, particularly close and pleasant. As a Jerseyman, I say that the State of New Jersey owes to Woodrow Wilson a debt of gratitude that it can scarce repay; for it was he who, when governor of our State, opened to us a new pathway, and started us again upon a glorious future. The people of New Jersey breathe more freely now. We have faith in him, and we love him. Now, in the larger and broader field of President of this great Republic I believe the great masses of all our fellow citizens are still firm in the belief that he is an unselfish patriot. They believe he is prompted only by honest and patriotic motives. But, Mr. President, honest and patriotic though we know him to be, he may err; and I believe this measure is a most serious and unfortunate error, though I feel it is one of the head and not of the heart. Presidents are but human. There is none of us who is infallible. Then, Mr. President, in this dilemma, and yielding to my conscience, I shall be on the side of my country as against any man on earth.

I want to be with the President. It is hard, very hard, for me to be against him in this matter, for I believe him to be a patriot and a conscientious man; but I want to be with him in heart and in conscience. On this matter of yielding our rights to satisfy the greed of Great Britain—and it can be termed nothing else—both voice and vote shall be recorded on the side of my country, and I shall vote "no" to this proposition.

I am told by some that by opposing this repeal I am breaking allegiance with my party. This I deny. I love my party. There is no Senator in this body or elsewhere who has made greater sacrifices than have I for 45 years for my party's welfare, as God gave me reason to understand it. No; the charge is as ungenerous as it is untrue. I was fighting the battles of my party when my present accusers knew not where they stood, but ran, like frantic madmen, to and fro, worshiping false gods on every side.

Mr. President, we own the land upon which this gigantic work has been about completed. The brains of American men conceived and designed the great undertaking. American men did the work; $400,000,000 or more of the hard-earned money of the people paid for it; more than a thousand lives have been sacrificed in the accomplishment of this stupendous work. Of course, it was built primarily to advance the well-being of the American people; and to this end I feel that we have the right to grant exemption from tolls, both ocean and coastwise, to our own people.

Mr. President, I feel that the treatment that foreign powers have received at our hands in connection with this great waterway is fair, just, and generous, and naught but greed and avarice on the part of any foreign power can prompt faultfinding or protest. I shall stand by the rights of our Government as I understand them. If there be doubts—and great minds do doubt—then I shall give the benefit of the doubt to America, my country.

Mr. President, I clipped from the London Times the following little editorial. It says, after some other matter, referring to the tolls:

It is, however, an unavoidable situation and will remain so as long as the Constitution gives Congress a share in the making of treaties.

Great God, Mr. President, they do not even like our form of government! Our Constitution is not right. They want to eliminate this. Is it not funny that some of the advocates of repeal on that side, and some of them on this side, have not had the wisdom to propose even our changing that to suit Great Britain?

The editorial says, further:

It * * * will remain so as long as the Constitution gives Congress a share in the making of treaties, or until the country is sufficiently educated in foreign affairs—

"Oh, ignoramuses of America, educate yourselves, absolve yourselves, cleanse yourselves by voting to repeal," is the dictum of Great Britain.

I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who unfortunately is on the English side of this question—I pray and beg him to formulate at once a bill that shall have for its purpose the education and teaching of the American people to give away their very souls to Great Britain without a whimper or a murmur.

Oh, what a humiliating spectacle! I fear this measure may pass this body. I ask, When will the bending and bowing of the American neck to the British yoke cease? I was taught that that ignoble habit on our part ended with the Battles of Princeton, of Monmouth, of Bunker Hill, and of Concord. Mr. President, have we, the sons of noble sires, degenerated? What will our sons say of us, what will the world say of us, if we yield to this unjust and unwarranted demand?

The whole demand is chiefly sentimental, after all. The President, in his address to the Congress, did not once claim that the United States were bound in law or morals to repeal this law; but he urged that since we are so rich, so big, so powerful, and so self-respecting we should accede to Great Britain's demand.

Ah, Mr. President, I feel the hour has come for America to assert herself, once for all, against these arrogant demands. Grant this unreasonable and unfair demand, and our children will not live to see the end of these unjustifiable claims.

I can see no justification or warrant in the proposition to submit this question to arbitration. Arbitration is only the escape door for doubtful minds, after all. I have no doubt on this matter. To submit it to arbitration would be an admission that we have doubts as to our own rights in our own territory.

Mr. President, arbitration? Arbitration? Did you ever hear of Great Britain pressing or assenting to arbitration with any nation except one stronger than herself? No! To a smaller or weaker power, the thundering of cannon and the clash of steel would be the answer.

Senators, run your minds back a few years. How well I remember it! Do you not recall the struggle of that Spartan band contending for justice, right, and liberty—the Boers? Did not they, while contending against brutal odds, ask for arbitration? What answer came back from this great Christian, peace-loving nation but more soldiers, the clash of steel, more cannon, and more blood?

It was most touching to me a short time ago to listen to the tremulous tones of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], trying to place Great Britain in a good light before the world, and to give her a clean bill of health. Read back further, until you find the poor, helpless Sepoy band bound in front of the English cannon mouths and shot therefrom in order to impress their helpless captives!

All this and more I might recite, but I sicken at the task.

We are told, Mr. President, that all this was done in the interests of peace, and for the advancement of Christianity and civilization. God help our land!

As to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I say most respectfully, and in a most kindly spirit, that the proposition is to me as empty as a shell. It is as though, on the highway, I were robbed of my belongings, and I should tell the highwayman, "Use my money, spend it as you will; all I ask is that you acknowledge, when you have done so, that it belongs to me."

Oh, I can not vote for such tomfoolery under any conditions. [Laughter.]

Senators, Democrats and Republicans, patriots all, join with us to avert the humiliation and disaster that threatens our Nation through the repeal of the canal-tolls bill.

I have listened, almost to the degree of nausea, to the well-worn plea: "Even though we do grant this demand, we will be only yielding to a nation of our blood and our bone." Mr. President, none of my blood or bone, I will thank you! Oh, it is humbug and nonsense!

It crossed my mind but to-day that this is 1914. They love us, we are told. This is 1914. Only a hundred years ago—but a day in the life of a nation—in 1814, our so-called brothers, of our bone and our blood, so loved us that they set fire to and burned the very building in which to-day we deliberate! They acted then as though they loved us, and they still act in the same way. I say sadly, and without feeling of revenge, that too many of my colleagues seem willing to sing praises and hallelujahs to the Crown of Great Britain in a higher key than they have ever tuned their voices or hearts to the air of "My country! My country!"

Mr. President, this is not a party question. It transcends all party controversy. I feel that it is vital to my country. Yet I feel that the well-being of our country is so interlaced and interwoven with the Democratic Party that I look with jealous eyes on every step that may be taken by our party while it is the dominant party, the ruling party, of the Nation. Therefore I appeal to you, my Democratic fellow Senators, to stop and listen; do not be led as willing lambs to the slaughter; for I tell you an outraged and wronged people will visit their vengeance on your heads.

I want to stimulate the building of ships, and I believe that with the completion of this great waterway, and exemption from tolls for both ocean and coastwise vessels, the dawn of a brighter day for the American merchant marine will be at hand.

Mr. President, listen:

There is nothing in which I am more interested than the fullest development of the trade of this country and its righteous conquest of foreign markets.

* * * * * * *

I am sure that I speak the convictions of all of you when I say that one of our chief needs is to have a merchant marine, because if we have to deliver our goods in other people's delivery wagons their goods are delivered first and our goods are delivered incidentally on their routes.

* * * * * * *

If the shipowners of the nations carry your grain and cargoes, they are going to carry them by routes and to markets which suit them, not the routes and the markets which are chosen by you.

Those words I quote. You know whose they are. They were delivered in the White House on the 28th day of May, less than two weeks ago. I stand with that theory. These are not my words, but they contain my thoughts and views. As I say, they are the words of the President of the United States, expressed by him on the 28th day of May. I want to bring about these thoughts in the form of legislation as passed by the Senate.

I have here a little clipping which I gleaned from the London Times. Some people think that this canal will not amount to much. Take the opinion of the London Times. The London Times says:

But the American foreign-carrying mercantile marine is comparatively small, and it is fairly certain that, as in the case of the Suez Canal, British ships will outnumber those of any other nation using the Panama Canal for a good many years to come.

That is, that America, owing to her small shipping interests, will be overdone by England for many, many years to come. God grant that America may have more. It has been my hope and my dream that I might live to the day when I should see the deep blue ocean decked with American-registered white-winged craft, messengers of peace, of plenty, of trade and commerce, carrying the products of our farms, our shops, our looms and mills, and the wealth of our mines to the remotest corners of the globe. It has been my hope and my prayer that each such craft might carry aloft our Starry Banner, and that it might go on and on to greet and reflect the morning sun in every clime and dip and drop only that it might kiss the waters of every sea.

Senators, thousands—yes, tens of thousands; aye, millions—of my countrymen share with me the same patriotic hope. Senators, will you dash from their lips this cup of glorious expectancy?

Mr. President, the dawn of a better day is near at hand. Stop, and do not take this step of weakness and imbecility.

To pass this repeal measure I feel is to blot our boasted Americanism, and it is to defile a page of our Nation's history.

My country, my country, I cherish thee still,
Though many the ills that defile thee;
I weep o'er thy wounds and pray for thy weal,
Yet never, no, never, revile thee.

[Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). The Senate will be in order. Manifestations in the galleries are prohibited by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have a letter which was sent to me by a very profound and distinguished lawyer in New York—I will say, by the way, the son of a former Member of the House of Representatives and author—Thomas Dunn English. I ask that it may be printed at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

No. 27 CEDAR STREET,
New York, May 2, 1914.

HON. JAMES H. MARTINE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In considering the question of repealing the clause of the act of 1912, exempting coastwise vessels from paying toll for passing through the Panama Canal, it appears that some advocates of the repeal claim the treaty with Great Britain of 1901 binds the United States to refrain from a regulation which discriminates in favor of the vessels of the United States as against those of other nations.

The first question which presents itself, before an examination of the words of the treaty, is whether or no the treaty itself is one of binding force on the Government. This entails an investigation as to the facts of its making and the effect of its being so made.

The treaty was negotiated and submitted to the United States Senate for ratification by the President, and the Senate ratified it by the necessary majority. So far as procedure is concerned the treaty was conducted throughout in the required constitutional manner.

But the power of the President to make such a treaty binding on the United States involves the subject matter to which it relates.

Its wording shows it to be a commercial treaty. It relates to navigation of a waterway constructed within territory solely under our control. It matters not whether that control be an easement or fee or whether a conditional estate in perpetuity or forever. This waterway is not a part of the high seas over which the vessels of all nations can alike and on equal terms transport their commerce. It is a privately constructed way provided by the United States, at its own and sole expense, for its own citizens and for such others as it may see fit to allow its use. No treaty with foreign nations was necessary to enable us to construct the canal as we finally decided to construct it; a cession of territory was all that was required, and we obtained that from Panama. There is no obligation on the part of the United States to allow the canal to be used by any foreign nation. To allow a canal built by the United States within its own territory, over which no foreign nation has any rights whatsoever, to be used by a foreign nation is a mere act of courtesy. We can extend that courtesy at such times and on such terms as Congress alone sees fit.

WHAT THE SUPREME COURT SAYS OF COMMERCE.

In Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., 419–445) Chief Justice Marshall says:

"The oppressed and degraded state of commerce previous to the adoption of the Constitution can scarcely be forgotten. It was regulated by foreign nations with a single view to their own interests, and our disunited efforts to counteract their restrictions were rendered impotent by want of combination. Congress, indeed, possessed the power of making treaties, but the inability of the Federal Government to enforce them had become so apparent as to render that power in a great degree useless. Those who felt the injury arising from this state of things and those who were capable of estimating the influence of commerce on the prosperity of nations perceived the necessity of giving the control over this important subject to a single government. It may be doubted whether any of the evils proceeding from the feebleness of the Federal Government contributed more to that great revolution which introduced the present system than the deep and general conviction that commerce ought to be regulated by Congress."

In accordance with the views above expressed by Marshall, the framers of the Constitution provided:

"ARTICLE I, SECTION 1. All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives."

What does this mean? It means, to use the words of the Federal Court in United States v. Ormsbee (74 Fed., 209), that—

"The sovereign power to make national laws is vested in Congress * * *."

By section 8 the Constitution provides:

"The Congress shall have power * * * to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States * * *."

In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 188) Chief Justice Marshall said:

"As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense and to have intended what they have said."

In the same case Marshall said:

"Commerce is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations, in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse. The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of the one nation into the ports of the other, and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals in the actual employment of buying and selling or of barter.

"The word 'commerce,' used in the Constitution then, comprehends, and has been always understood to comprehend, navigation within its meaning; and a power to regulate navigation is as expressly granted as if the term had been added to the word 'commerce.'

"It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words 'with foreign nations,' etc., comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other to which this power does not extend.

"What is this power? It is the power to regulate; that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed."

From the provisions of the Constitution and the words of the Supreme Court cited it is clear that Congress alone can make laws and that Congress alone can regulate commerce. Upon no other body are these powers conferred, hence commerce and navigation can not be regulated or interfered with by any department of the Government without the consent of Congress. And Congress comprises the Senate and the House of Representatives.

"The power vested in Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes is the power to prescribe the rule by which that commerce is to be governed, and is a power complete in itself acknowledging no limitations other than those prescribed in the Constitution." (Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S., 100.)

"Having power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and navigation being a branch of that commerce, it has the control of all navigable waters between the States, or connecting with the ocean, so as to preserve and protect their free navigation." (Miller v. New York, 109 U. S., 393.)

Mr. Justice Story, in The Barque Chusan (2 Story, 455–464), said:

"The power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate navigation with foreign nations and among the States, and it is an exclusive power in Congress. This I conceive has been firmly established by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the doctrine stands, as I conceive, upon grounds which can not be shaken without endangering the interests of the whole Union, if not the very existence of the Constitution as a frame of Government for the professed objects and purposes which it was intended to accomplish. * * * Congress having power to regulate the whole subject, regulates it as much by what it leaves without positive regulations as by what it expressly provided for."

But why add more authorities? The Supreme Court Reports are filled with like expressions and in no case has that court ever held that the right to regulate commerce existed in any other department than the legislative.

The grant in the Constitution to Congress to regulate commerce is exclusive, and that means that no other body can exercise that power. It means that all rules which restrict or regulate or extend or interfere with commerce are void unless Congress has authorized them.

In March, 1789, Congress, knowing its exclusive jurisdiction over commerce, passed the following resolution:

"That provision ought to be made by law for holding a treaty to establish peace between the United States and the Wabash, Miami, and other nations of Indians northwest of the Ohio River; also for regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes and the mode of extinguishing their claims to lands within the United States."

On August 7, 1789, Washington, recognizing or being advised of the exclusive powers of Congress over commerce, sent to Congress the following message:

"If it should be the judgment of Congress that it would be most expedient to terminate all differences in the southern district, and to lay the foundation for future confidence by an amicable treaty with the Indian tribes in that quarter, I think proper to suggest the consideration of the expediency of instituting a temporary commission for that purpose, to consist of three persons whose authority shall expire with the occasion."

Thus Congress recognized and Washington acknowledged that when any commercial matter was to be transacted it required that Congress should act; that in Congress alone lay the power to regulate commerce, and no other department of the Government could make any treaty or regulation concerning it.

But the Constitution, Article II, section 2, says that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present shall concur."

Congress and Washington, from the resolution and message heretofore cited, evidently did not think this power to make treaties thus conferred on the President extended to a treaty of commerce. Both the President and many Members of that Congress had sat in the convention that framed the Constitution, and it had gone into effect the same month the above resolution was passed, and but five months before Washington sent the message suggesting to Congress it make a treaty with the southern Indians.

But there are other clauses of the Constitution relating to treaties.

Section 2 of Article III provides that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made, under their authority * * *."

What does "under their authority" apply to? Clearly it means under the authority of the Constitution and the laws made by Congress. Thus the judicial power only extends to treaties made under the authority of the Constitution or under some law of Congress. This would indicate beyond doubt that the framers contemplated that there would be some treaties at least that would require a law of Congress before they would become valid and that the law authorizing or making effective such a treaty would have to be one within the Constitution and not in violation of it. Does this word "their" limit the jurisdiction of the courts to such treaties as are made under authority of a law of Congress? Or is it a limitation on the character of treaties that the President and Senate can make? I think the latter.

What kind of treaties, then, would be those made under the authority of the laws of the United States? Clearly those treaties which contained any matter of which the Constitution had given Congress exclusive jurisdiction. Treaties relating to other matters could be made by the President and Senate without authority of Congress. Treaties which related to commerce, or war, or money, or the 17 matters specifically mentioned in article 1 could not be made alone by the President and Senate and some foreign ruler or Indian chief, because the subject matter had been confined exclusively to the lawmaking power, which meant the House and Senate, not the Senate and President.

But there is another provision of the Constitution on this subject and it provides, Article VII:

"This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

What means this provision that a treaty shall be the supreme law of the land?

It means, as declared in section 2, Article III, that treaties made under the authority of the United States shall be supreme law as against the Constitution and laws of the States. It certainly does not mean that the treaties shall be the supreme law as against the Constitution of the United States. Nor the supreme law as against the statute of the only body that the Constitution gives power to make laws. "Under the authority of the United States" means under the sovereign power of the United States and the sovereign power can only be expressed by Congress. This provision of Article VII must be read with section 2 of Article III and what it means is clear.

WHAT THE COURTS SAY.

What say the courts on this subject?

In Doe v. Braden (16 How., 635) Chief Justice Taney says:

"The treaty is therefore a law made by the proper authority, and the courts of justice have no right to annul or disregard any of the provisions, unless they violate the Constitution of the United States.

"The treaty power as expressed in the Constitution is in terms unlimited, except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter without its consent." (De Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S., 258.)

In Siemssen v. Bofer (6 Cal., 252) Chief Justice Murray, of the Supreme Court of California, said:

"The treaty-making power can only be coeval with the express grant of power to the Federal Government and can never be extended by implication to the reserved powers of the States and matters which belong to State sovereignty or the right which appertains to govern her own domestic concerns and establish her own police regulations; neither can the exercise of this power on the part of the President and Senate be extended to matters which are the proper subject of congressional limitation."

In Foster v. Nielson (2 Pet., 314) Marshall said:

"A treaty is in its nature a contract between two nations, not a legislative act. In the United States a different principle is established.

"Our Constitution declares a treaty to be a law of the land. It is consequently to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the legislature whenever it operates of itself, without the aid of any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract—when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act—the treaty addresses itself to the political, not to the judicial, department, and the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court."

After commenting on the treaty he continued:

"This seems to be the language of contracts, and if it is the ratification and confirmation which are promised must be the act of the legislature; until such act be passed the court is not at liberty to disregard the existing laws on the subject."

The treaty regarding the navigation of the Panama Canal is clearly a contract as to its use. It is a contract which gives all nations subscribing to the rules relating to navigation of that way certain privileges, and thus it is a commercial contract but inoperative until sanctioned by Congress.

In Turner v. American Baptist Missionary Union (5 McLean, 344) Justice McLean, of the United States Supreme Court, said:

"A treaty under the Constitution is declared to be the supreme law of the land. This unquestionably applies to all treaties where the treaty-making power, without the aid of Congress, can carry it into effect. It is not, however, and can not be, the supreme law of the land where the concurrence of Congress is necessary to give it effect. Until this power is exercised, as when the appropriation of money is required, the treaty is not perfect. It is not operative in the sense of the Constitution, as money can not be appropriated by the treaty-making power. This results from the limitations of our Government. The action of no department of the Government can be regarded as law until it can have all the sanctions required by the Constitution to make it such. As well might it be contended that an ordinary act of Congress, without the signature of the President, was a law as that a treaty which engages to pay a sum of money is in itself a law, and in such cases the representatives of the people of the States exercise their own judgment in granting or withholding the money. They act upon their own responsibility and not on the responsibility of the treaty-making power. It can not bind or control the legislative action in this respect, and every foreign Government may be presumed to know that so far as the treaty stipulates to pay money the legislative action is required."

This reasoning, of course, applies to a treaty relating to navigation.

In Taylor v. Martin (2 Curtis, 454) Justice Curtis, also of the Supreme Court, said:

"To refuse to execute a treaty for reasons that approve themselves to the conscientious judgment of the Nation is a matter of the utmost gravity and delicacy; but the power to do so is a prerogative of which no nation can be deprived without deeply affecting its independence. That the people of the United States have deprived their Government of this power in any case, I do not believe. That it must reside somewhere and be applicable to all cases, I am convinced. I feel no doubt that it belongs to Congress."

The words in each of the above decisions would apply to a regulation of commerce as to an appropriation of money. In either case the exclusive power of the subject is given to Congress and a treaty concerning it would be inoperative without the sanction of Congress and, as Mr. Justice McLean says, every foreign Government is presumed to know this.

Madison, in March, 1796, nine years after he had sat as an active member of the convention that framed the Constitution, said:

"The term supreme as applied to treaties evidently meant a supremacy over the State constitutions and laws, and not over the Constitution and laws of the United States; and it was observable that the judicial authority and the existing laws alone of the States fell within the supremacy expressly enjoined."

There is still another clause in the Constitution that bears on this question. It is the eighteenth power given Congress in Article I, and it reads that Congress shall have power—

"to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof."

This is a sweeping provision and well indicates the intention of the convention to repose a power in Congress that was supreme to all other powers granted.

This confers on Congress the sole power to make laws to carry into execution a decision of a Federal court or an act of the President. The courts have recognized it in their case. In the case of the President, while he is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in time of war, his chieftianship is nothing without an act of Congress to carry it into execution. There are but very few acts of the President that he can carry into execution against the wishes of Congress. And when it comes to making a treaty which concerns one of the seventeen matters confided to Congress exclusively, the President is without any power whatsoever beyond negotiation and a promise to use his endeavors to have it sanctioned by Congress. Beyond that he is without power.

There is but one body that can make a supreme law of the land, and that is Congress. If the Czar of Russia and the Senate and the President could make a treaty concerning one of the matters delegated alone to Congress there is no word in the Constitution conferring the power. If these three could make a law, then there are two law-making bodies in the United States Government, and a say in one may be an alien despot or an Indian chief.

Is it possible that anyone who can read places such a construction on our Constitution—that he can find in the plain words of the Constitution the establishment of two law-making powers, each capable of repealing the law of the other?

Mr. Justice McLean, of the Supreme Court, in Smith v. Turner (7 How., 396) said:

"A concurrent power in two distinct sovereignties to regulate the same thing is as inconsistent in principles as it is impracticable in acton. It involves a moral and physical impossibility. A joint action is not supposed, and two independent wills can not do the same thing. The action of one, unless there be an arrangement, must necessarily precede the action of the other; and that which is first, being competent, must establish the rule. If the powers be equal, as must be the case, both being sovereign, one may undo what the other does, and this must be the result of their action."

Seven years after the adoption of the Constitution, the House of Representatives considered this very question. Almost without exception the party of Jefferson and Madison maintained that no treaty made by a foreign king with the aid of the Senate and President could make a law on any subject which the Constitution had exclusively confined to Congress by Article I.

At that time Hamilton was writing the messages of Washington and sent a message to Congress that combated the position taken by Madison and other Democratic Republicans in the House. Hamilton's position was absolutely destroyed by Madison and a host of other able statesmen. And later he himself refuted one of his own arguments, as also did the United States Supreme Court.

WHAT OUR STATESMEN SAID ON THE SUBJECT.

Jefferson, on March 13, 1816, writing of Washington's real attitude on the question at that time and also indicating his own, says:

"A writer in the National Intelligencer of February 24 who signs himself B., is endeavoring to shelter himself under the cloak of Gen. Washington, the present enterprise of the Senate to wrest from the House of Representatives the power, given them by the Constitution, of participating with the Senate in the establishment and continuance of laws on specified subject. Their aim is by associating an Indian chief, or foreign Government, in form of a treaty, to possess themselves of the power of repealing laws become obnoxious to them, without the assent of the third branch, although that assent was necessary to make it a law. We are then to depend for the secure possession of our laws, not on our immediate Representatives chosen by ourselves, and amenable to ourselves every other year, but on Senators chosen by the legislatures, amenable to them only, and that but at intervals of six years, which is nearly the common estimate for a term for life. But no act of that sainted worthy, no thought of Gen. Washington, ever countenanced a change of our Constitution so vital as would be the rendering insignificant the popular, and giving to the aristocratical branch of our Government the power of depriving us of our laws."

This accords with Washington's message to Congress in 1789, before given.

Jefferson, writing to William B. Giles on the subject on December 31, 1795, said:

"Randolph seems to have hit upon the true theory of our Constitution; that when a treaty is made, involving matters confided by the Constitution to the three branches of the legislature conjointly, the Representatives are as free as the President and Senate were to consider whether the national interest requires or forbids their giving the forms and force of law to the articles over which they have a power."

By Randolph, Jefferson meant Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, who took an important part in framing the Constitution and was Attorney General under Washington.

On March 21, 1796, Jefferson wrote to James Monroe as follows:

"The British treaty has been formally at length laid before Congress. All America is a-tiptoe to see what the House of Representatives will decide on it. We conceive the constitutional doctrine to be, that though the President and Senate have the general power of making treaties, yet whenever they include in a treaty matters confided by the Constitution to the three branches of legislature, an act of legislation will be requisite to confirm these articles, and that the House of Representatives as one branch of the legislature are perfectly free to pass the act or to refuse it, governing themselves by their own judgment whether it is for the good of their constituents to let the treaty go into effect or not. On the precedent now to be set will depend the future construction of our Constitution and whether the powers of legislation shall be transferred from the President and Senate and House of Representatives to the President and Senate and Piamingo or any other Indian, Algerine or other chief."

On March 27, 1796, Jefferson wrote a letter to Madison in which, after commending Gallatin's speech on the treaty, he says:

"According to the rule established by usage and common sense, of construing one part of the instrument by another, the objects on which the President and Senate may exclusively act by treaty are much reduced, but the field on which they may act with the sanction of the legislature is large enough; and I see no harm in rendering their sanction necessary, and not much harm in annihilating the whole treaty-making power except as to making peace. If you decide in favor of your right to refuse cooperation in any case of treaty, I should wonder on what occasion it is to be used, if not in one where the rights, the interest, the honor, and faith of one nation are so grossly sacrificed; where a faction has entered into a conspiracy with the enemies of their country to chain down the legislature at the feet of both."

Richard Henry Lee, the Revolutionary general and a distinguished writer of the time when the Constitution was under consideration by the States for ratification, writing over the title of "The Federal Farmer," said:

"On a fair construction of the Constitution I think the Legislature has a proper control over the President and Senate in settling commercial treaties. By one article 'the Legislature shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations,' etc., and by another article the President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate, shall have power to make treaties. These clauses must be considered together; and we ought never to make one part of the same instrument contradict another, if it can be avoided by any reasonable construction. By the first recital clause the Legislature has the power—that is, as I understand it, the sole power—to regulate commerce with foreign nations or to make all the rules and regulations respecting trade and commerce between our citizens and foreigners. By the second recital clause the President and Senate have power generally to make treaties. There are several kinds of treaties, as treaties of commerce, of peace, of alliance, etc. I think the words 'to make treaties' may be consistently construed, and yet so as it shall be left to the Legislature to confirm commercial treaties. They are in their nature and operation very distinct from treaties of peace and of alliance. The latter generally require secrecy. But it is but very seldom they interfere with the laws and internal police of the country, and operate immediately on persons or property, especially in commercial towns—they have in Great Britain usually been confirmed by Parliament. They consist of rules and regulations respecting commerce; and to regulate commerce, or to make regulations respecting commerce, the Federal Legislature, by the Constitution, has the power. I do not see that any commercial regulations can be made in treaties that will not infringe upon this power in the Legislature. Therefore, I infer that the true construction is that the President and Senate shall make treaties, but all commercial treaties shall be subject to be confirmed by the Legislature. This construction will render the clauses consistent, and make the powers of the President and Senate respecting treaties much less exceptional."

Madison, in a speech in conflict between treaty and grant to Congress in 1796, is reported as follows:

"It was an important, and appeared to him to be a decisive view of the subject, that if the treaty power alone could perform any one act for which the authority of Congress is required by the Constitution, it may perform every act for which the authority of that part of the Government is required. Congress have power to regulate trade, to declare war, to raise armies, to levy, to borrow, and appropriate money, etc. If by treaty, therefore, as paramount to the legislative power, the President and Senate can regulate trade, they can also declare war, they can raise armies to carry on war, and they can procure money to support armies. These powers, however different in their nature or importance, are on the same footing in the Constitution and must share the same fate. A Member from Connecticut had admitted that the power of war was exclusively vested in Congress; but he had not attempted, nor did it seem possible, to draw any line between that and the other enumerated powers. If any line could be drawn, it ought to be presented to the committee; and he should for one be ready to give it the most impartial consideration. He had not, however, any expectation that such an attempt could succeed; and therefore should submit to the serious consideration of the committee that although the Constitution had carefully and jealously lodged the power of war, of armies, of the purse, etc., in Congress, of which the immediate Representatives of the people formed an integral part, yet, according to the construction maintained on the other side, the President and Senate by means of a treaty of alliance with a nation at war might make the United States parties in the war. They might stipulate subsidies and even borrow money to pay them; they might furnish troops to be carried to Europe, Asia, or Africa; they might even attempt to keep up a standing army in time of peace for the purpose of cooperating on given contingencies with an ally for mutual safety or other common objects. Under this aspect the treaty power would be tremendous. The force of this reasoning is not obviated by saying that the President and Senate would only pledge the public faith, and that the agency of Congress would be necessary to carry it into operation. For what difference does this make if the obligation imposed be, as is alleged, a constitutional one, if Congress have no will but to obey, and if to disobey be treason and rebellion against the constituted authorities? Under a constitutional obligation with such sanctions to it, Congress, in case the President and Senate should enter into an alliance for war, would be nothing more than the mere heralds for proclaiming it. In fact, it had been said that they must obey the injunctions of a treaty as implicitly as a subordinate officer in the executive line was bound to obey the Chief Magistrate, or as the judges are bound to decide according to the laws.

"As a further objection to the doctrine contended for, he called the attention of the committee to another very serious consequence from it. The specific powers as vested in Congress by the Constitution are qualified by sundry exceptions deemed of great importance to the safe exercise of them.

"These restrictions are contained in section 9 of the Constitution, and in the articles of amendment which have been added to it; thus, 'the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States shall think proper to admit shall not be prohibited by Congress.'"

He referred to several of the other restrictive paragraphs which followed, particularly the fifth, which says that no tax shall be laid on exports, no preference given to the parts of one State over those of another, etc. It was Congress also, he observed, which was to make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble, etc. Now, if the legislative powers specifically vested in Congress are to be no limitation or check to the treaty power, it was evident that the exception to those powers could be no limitation or check to the treaty power.

Returning to the powers particularly lodged in Congress, Madison took notice of those relating to war and money, or the sword and the purse, as requiring a few additional observations in order to show that the treaty power could not be paramount over them.

It was well known that, with respect to the regulation of commerce, it had long remained under the jurisdiction of the States; and that in the establishment of the present Government the question was whether, and how far, it should be transferred to the general jurisdiction. But with respect to the power of making war, it had from the commencement of the Revolution been judged and exercised as a brand of the general authority essential to the public safety. The only question therefore that could arise was whether the power should be lodged in this or that department of the Federal Government. And we find it expressly vested in the legislative and not in the executive department; with a view, no doubt, to guard it against the abuses, which might be apprehended, from placing the power of declaring war in those hands which would conduct it when declared; and which therefore, in the ordinary course of things, would be most tempted to go into war. But according to the doctrine now maintained, the United States, by means of an alliance with a foreign power, might be driven into a state of war by the President and Senate contrary both to a sense of the Legislature and to the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

On the subject also of appropriating money, particularly to a military establishment, the provision of the Constitution demanded the most severe attention. To prevent the continuance of a military force for a longer term than might be indispensable, it is expressly declared that no appropriation for the support of armies shall be made for more than two years, so that at the end of every two years the question whether a military force ought to be continued or not must be open for consideration and can be decided in the negative by either the House of Representatives or the Senate refusing to concur in the requisite appropriation. This is a most important check and security against the danger of standing armies and against the prosecution of a war beyond its national objects; and the efficacy of the precaution is the greater, as at the end of every two years a reelection of the House of Representatives gives the people an opportunity of judgment on the occasion for themselves.

But if, as is contended, the House of Representatives have no right to deliberate on appropriations pledged by the President and Senate, and can not refuse them without a breach of the Constitution and of their oaths, the case is precisely the same, and the same effects would follow, as if the appropriations were not limited to two years but made for the whole period contemplated at once. Where would be the check for a biennial appropriation for a military establishment raised for four years, if at the end of two years the appropriation was to be continued by a constitutional necessity for two years more?

Albert Gallatin, Edward Livingstone, and other prominent statesmen of the day supported the position taken by Madison.

John Page, of Virginia, friend of Washington, Revolutionary soldier, and afterwards governor of Virginia, said:

"I may agree that a treaty is necessary to establish a commercial intercourse between two nations to their mutual advantage and satisfaction, but I must affirm that as that treaty would be a commercial regulation, and as Congress is expressly empowered by the Constitution to regulate commerce, whenever such treaty shall be made between the United States and any other nation Congress must either direct that the negotiation be commenced upon conditions approved or sanction the ratification of such treaty by some act showing that the regulation of commerce by the treaty was made by the authority of Congress, in conformity to the Constitution. Besides, if the President and Senate can regulate the commerce of the United States with one nation, they can with all nations, and if they can with all, what nation can there be with whom Congress can regulate commerce? This argument must therefore fall to the ground. We are told, however, that the treaty-making power, from its nature, is competent to all the objects and is not to be controlled or checked by the House.

* * * * * * *

"If it be true, then, can the President repeal, as he has by the treaty, the laws of Congress, although by the Constitution he can not negative them? He can oblige Congress to levy taxes; can withdraw impost and tonnage from their reach; prohibit the exportation of sundry articles of produce of the United States, although the Constitution forbids the Senate and House of Representatives concurring to lay the smallest duty on the exportation of any article; he can create offices and annex salaries thereto, destroy the rights of the House, provoke war; in short he can do anything; but this we are sworn to deny. The absurdity of that construction must be evidence, and the recollections of our oaths to support the Constitution, of which we have been reminded, must force us to revolt at the thoughts of adopting such a monstrous construction of the Constitution."

Mr. Page then said that the amendments submitted by Virginia were intended to remove the evils which the construction of those gentlemen put on the Constitution if adopted must produce.

He further said that if no objections had been made to treaties before, it might be said to be high time for us to make a stand, to examine into and check a little the expensive business of treaty making.

Mr. Richard Brent argued that treaties became supreme law of the land if they involved only executive powers; if it involved powers confided to Congress the President could only make a conditional treaty, and the treaty did not become a law until Congress so made it.

Brent contended that a treaty made by the President and Senate, as far as it relates to commerce, is not a treaty made under the authority of the United States until it has obtained the sanction of the Legislature. If treaties can repeal laws, then laws can repeal the Constitution, for the second laws are to the Constitution what the treaties are to the laws, therefore treaties could repeal the Constitution.

THE HOUSE ADOPTS THE SAME CONSTRUCTION.

April 6, 1796, the House of Representatives passed the following resolution written by Madison:

"Resolved, That it being declared by the second article of the Constitution that the President shall have power, by and with the advice of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senate present concur, the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress it must depend for its execution as to such stipulations on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives in all such cases to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaties into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good."

FEAR OF USURPATION BY THE PRESIDENT.

The fear of Executive power by the people of the States was very general and marked. After the Constitution had been submitted to the States for ratification many amendments were submitted to the convention for its consideration. The people generally understood that the proposed Government was to be one of delegated powers only and that what was not especially delegated could not be exercised. Yet there was a desire to impress upon the prospective officeholders and the prospective Congress certain things that they should not do and certain powers they should not exercise. The people feared that without the prohibition the new Government would be led to exceed the powers delegated and usurp powers not mentioned.

The managers of the convention were fully aware that undelegated powers did not and could not exist in a Government of limited jurisdiction, but they did not deem it necessary to encumber the Constitution with a lot of what they deemed unnecessary prohibitions. Hence they rejected everything of that character.

As an evidence, however, of the fear in which the people stood of an Executive and of their desire that the lawmaking power should participate in everything, a few of these proposals by the different States may not be inappropriate to refer to.

Virginia proposed as an amendment to the Constitution—

"That all power of suspending laws or the execution of laws by any authority without the consent of the representatives of the people in the legislature is injurious to their rights and ought not to be exercised."

North Carolina proposed the same.

The States wanted to impress beyond question the principle that no power could supersede a law without the consent of Congress.

Maryland also considered proposing a similar clause, but neglected to submit it.

North Carolina submitted an amendment reading:

"That no treaties which shall be directly opposed to the existing laws of the United States in Congress assembled shall be valid until such laws shall be repealed or made conformable to such treaty, nor shall any treaty be valid which is contradictory to the Constitution of the United States."

Virginia also proposed—

"that no navigation law or law regulating commerce shall be passed without the consent of two-thirds of the Members present in both Houses."

Other proposals indicative of the disinclination to allow an Executive to act without the sanction of Congress and to impress it upon him, even though not necessary, because the Federal Government was one of delegated powers alone, were the following:

From New York came a provision reading—

"that no Standing Army or regular troops shall be raised or kept up in time of peace without the consent of two-thirds of the Senators and Representatives in each House."

"That no money be borrowed on the credit of the United States without the assent of two-thirds of the Senators and Representatives in each House."

New Hampshire, Maryland, and Virginia also made the same proposal with regard to keeping a Standing Army.

John C. Calhoun, in his "Constitution and Government of the United States," says:

"But although the treaty-making power is exclusively vested, and without enumeration or specification, in the Government of the United States, it is, nevertheless, subject to several important limitations. It is, in the first place, strictly limited to questions inter alios; that is, to questions between us and foreign powers which require negotiations to adjust them. All such clearly appertain to it. But to extend the power beyond these, be the pretext what it may, would be to extend it beyond its allotted sphere, and thus a palpable violation of the Constitution. It is, in the next place, limited by all the provisions of the Constitution which inhibit certain acts from being done by the Government or any of its departments, of which description there are many. It is also limited by such provisions of the Constitution as direct certain acts to be done in a particular way, and which prohibit the contrary, of which a striking example is to be found in that which declares that 'no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations to be made by law.' This not only imposes an important restriction on the power, but gives to Congress, as the lawmaking power and to the House of Representatives as a portion of Congress, the right to withhold appropriations; and thereby an important control over the treaty-making power whenever money is required to carry a treaty into effect, which is usually the case, especially those of much importance."

John Randolph said:

"Where a treaty is made involving matters confided by the Constitution to Congress the Representatives are as free as the President or the Senate were to consider whether the national interests require or forbid their giving the forms and force of law to the articles over which they have this power."

Further illustrations of what the President and Senate could do if the supreme power of making treaties were true are unnecessary. Any reader may examine the Constitution for himself and see from the 17 exclusive powers given Congress what the President could do if his power to make a treaty without Congress were unlimited. Such an examination will convince any intelligent man, be he layman or lawyer, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is inoperative and invalid.

Jefferson, in his Manual, a copy of which every Congressman and Senator has always at hand, speaking of the treaty-making power, says:

"By the Constitution of the United States this department of legislation is confided to two branches only of the ordinary Legislature—the President originating and the Senate having a negative. To what subjects this power extends has not been defined in detail by the Constitution nor are we entirely agreed among ourselves.

"1. It is admitted that it must concern the foreign-nation party to the contract or it would be a mere nullity, res inter alios acta.

"2. By the general power to make treaties the Constitution must have intended to comprehend only those subjects which are usually regulated by treaty, and can not be otherwise regulated.

"3. It must have meant to except out of these the rights reserved to the States, for surely the President and Senate can not do by treaty what the whole Government is interdicted from doing anyway.

"4. And also to except those subjects of legislation in which it gave a participation to the House of Representatives. This last exception is denied by some on the ground that it would leave very little for the treaty power to work on. The less the better, say others. The Constitution thought it wise to restrain the Executive and Senate from entangling and embroiling our affairs with those of Europe. Besides, as the negotiations are carried on by the Executive alone, the subjecting to the ratification of the Representatives such articles as are within their participation is no more inconvenient than to the Senate."

Henry Clay in 1820 said, speaking of the treaty with Spain, relating to the boundary between Louisiana and Mexico:

"The Constitution of the United States has not defined the precise limits of that power, because from the nature of it they could not be presented. It appears to me, however, that no safe American statesman will assign to it a boundless scope. I presume, for example, that it will not be pretended that in a government which is itself limited there is a functionary without limits. The first great bound to the power in question, I apprehend, is that no treaty can constitutionally transcend the very object and purposes of the Government itself. I think also that wherever there are specified grants of power to Congress they limit and control, or, I would rather say, modify the exercise of the general grant of the treaty-making power upon a principle which is familiar to everyone. * * * But if the concurrence of this House be not necessary in the cases asserted, if there be no restriction upon the power, I am considering it may draw to itself and absorb the whole of the powers of the Government. To contract alliances, to stipulate for raising troops to be employed in a common war about to be waged, to grant subsidies, even to introduce foreign troops within the bosom of the country, are not infrequent instances of the exercise of this power; and if in all such cases the honor and faith of the Nation are committed by the exclusive act of the President and Senate, the melancholy duty alone might be left to Congress of recording the ruin of the Republic."

S. M. Cullom, late Senator from Illinois, on July 10, 1868, said:

"Congress can not originate a treaty, nor can the President and Senate raise revenue nor regulate commerce."

Mr. Upshur, in instructing Mr. Wheaton, minister to Prussia in 1843, regarding the treaty with the Zollverein, said to bear "always in mind that the sanction of Congress, as well as of the Executive, will be indispensably required."

In declining to ratify the treaty with the Zollverein in 1844, the Committee on Foreign Relations reported that—

"The Constitution in express terms delegates the power to Congress to regulate commerce and to impose duties and to no other, and that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress.

William Loughridge, a celebrated lawyer of Iowa, on June 30, 1868, on the floor of the House, said:

"An attempt is made, through the means of the treaty-making power, to concentrate almost all of the power of this Government in the hands of the President, subject only to the advice and consent of the Senate. And this proposition is, if adopted, a long step in that direction. I hesitate not to say, sir, that if, without any explanation, disaffirmance, or protest, we make this appropriation, we shall, so far as this House can do it, have surrendered practically all the power of the Government into the hands of the treaty-making department and reduced this House to the position of an involuntary agent of that power, with no discretion but to carry out its expressed will. That we are rapidly drifting in that direction, it seems to me, must be apparent to the most casual observer.

"By substituting a foreign Government or an Indian tribe in place of this House, on the principle claimed by the Executive, there is nothing within the whole scope of the legislative powers of the Government that can not be done without the consent or intervention of this House. I defy any gentleman to point out a single act of legislation that can not be done through and by the treaty-making power, if we admit that power to the extent claimed by the Executive."

There is even another ground for holding this treaty to be invalid and that is the lack of power in the President and Senate and the King of Great Britain to deprive the American people of a right which they own. Whence this power to grant away any interests of the country without compensation? It is certainly not given by the Constitution. In England, for an ambassador to agree to do what is beyond his authority is ground for impeachment, and it was held even by Washington's friends that he might be impeached if he went beyond his authority in agreeing to the Jay treaty with England.

What say the writers of despotic countries on this subject? Martin (L. U., ch. 1, sec. 3, p. 49) says:

"Anything that has been promised by the chief or his agent beyond the limits of the authority with which the State has intrusted him is at most no more than a simple promise (sponsio) which only obliges the promisor to use his endeavors to produce the ratification."

Again, he says that—

"Even the stipulation of a monarch, though he should be absolute, can not be valid if it militates against the fundamental law of the State unless ratified by the nation."

Fiore, in his Volkerecht, section 98, says:

"All treaties are to be looked upon as null which are in any way opposed to the development of the activities of a nation, or which hinder the exercise of its own natural rights."

Hefter declares to the same effect.

Vattel (2d book, ch. 22, p. 298) says:

"A treaty pernicious to the State is null and not obligatory, no conductor of the nation having power to make such treaties. The nation itself can not enter into engagements contrary to its indispensable obligations. In the year 1506 the States General of the Kingdom of France, assembled at Tours, engaged Louis XII to break the treaty he had concluded with the Emperor Maximilian, and the Archduke Philip, his son, because that treaty was pernicious to the kingdom. They found that neither the treaty nor the oath that had accompanied it could oblige the King to alienate the dominions of the Crown. From the same reason, a want of power, a treaty is absolutely null."

Yet these writers were speaking of treaties made by monarchs, and not by a servant of the people, like the President of the United States, whose powers are limited by a written Constitution, and where the sole body that can make law is Congress.

Under what theory of interpretation can it be claimed that the President of the United States can make a treaty that a despot can not?

"The powers of the President * * * can not be enlarged by analogy to the powers of an English King, because the two have their origin and mode of existence in different and opposite principles." (10 Opin. Atty. Gen., 545.)

"But they are not prerogatives—they are legal powers vested in, and duties imposed upon, the President by the letter of the Constitution; and they are to be exercised and judged of as other granted powers and imposed duties are." (Ibid.)

Therefore the powers exercised by the King of Great Britain or of the chief executive of any foreign nation is not authority in the United States.

From the authorities to which I have called your attention it is clear this alleged treaty was a mere promise by the then President to use his endeavors to have it enacted into a law by Congress. As that was never done, there is no question of faith or contract involved. And every foreign Government may be presumed to have known when the treaty was signed that so far as it stipulated to regulate commerce legislative action was required. Great Britain knew this, particularly as her own laws require parliamentary action after the King ratifies a commercial treaty before it becomes binding on the Government.

With assurances of my high regard and admiration for the courageous stand you have taken on this Panama treaty matter, I beg to remain,

Yours, respectfully,

ARTHUR ENGLISH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names there is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I do not intend to prolong the discussion unnecessarily this afternoon. I think, however, in view of the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] on Saturday last, it may not be inappropriate to say that the latitude of debate in the Senate of which he complains has many times illustrated the wisdom of that method of procedure in this body. I have seen measures of far-reaching importance stripped of imperfections by elucidation and debate, resulting in legislation that was wholesome and of practical value to the country, while ill-considered bills rarely reflect the sober judgment of Congress or the people we represent. Hasty judgment smacks of sovereign decrees. Republics should forge no fetters in a night.

As I recollect it, when the tariff bill came over here from the other House a few months ago, many Senators, especially upon that side of the Chamber and newer Members of this body, deplored the fact that they could not enact that bill into a law without delay, and it was hinted that revenue bills were solely the function of the House of Representatives, and the Senate should promptly approve such bills without debate. Sir, we still remain a coordinate branch of the American Government, and while our methods are old-fashioned there remains much good work for us to do. Several eminent British diplomats, including Mr. Bryce, long accredited to Washington by the English sovereign, characterizes this body as unnecessary to the perfection of our system of Government, and deplores the delay and often the defeat of international contracts because of the local influences affecting our judgment. The King can bind the Empire of Great Britain; but since Valley Forge and Yorktown, no one man speaks with authority for this blessed Union of States. We changed schedule after schedule of the tariff bill and when it left this Chamber it was less imperfect than when we received it.

When the banking and currency bill, of which the Senator from Oklahoma had charge, left the committee of CARTER GLASS in the House of Representatives the President of the United States was quoted as saying that it was the most perfect banking and currency measure ever devised by man. Yet under the wide latitude of discussion afforded in this Chamber 50 per cent of the bill as it originally appeared in the House of Representatives was changed. Can anyone say that unlimited debate was harmful to that legislation?

Take the message of President Wilson on the Mexican situation. He forced through the House of Representatives without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" a resolution so irregular and inappropriate that even the Democratic members of the Committee on Foreign Relations would not support it. When it reached here, instead of directing attention to wrongs and injuries we had suffered at the hands of prowling bandits and misgovernment in Mexico, he focused his animosity upon a defenseless and unfortunate soldier of fortune, then struggling with problems beyond his control, and sent our Army and Navy into his dominion, armed only with a searchlight and a microscope, with instructions to find this offender somewhere among the 17,000,000 of his countrymen and bring him forth for execution in the sight of the world.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to yield, but I will yield of course.

Mr. LEWIS. I will not insist on interrupting the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will yield to my honored friend from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I think I prefer not to interrupt the discussion. I fear it would cause some debate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does any Senator doubt that the unlimited discussion given to that matter improved its form, that it was far more creditable to our Government and our statesmanship than when it passed the coordinate branch of Congress under whip and spur of Executive decree? Certainly not.

Now we are wrestling with the Panama tolls bill, of supreme national importance because it involves the reconstruction of a treaty with a great foreign power; perhaps we are laying down a rule which will burden our countrymen for generations to come; and yet we are told that the President is impatient with our delay. O sir, if we are to be unfaithful, we can at least be reverent. Thus far I have taken no time. I am not going to take time unnecessarily this afternoon; neither shall I traverse the statements so often and so strongly made upon both sides; but I am going to invite the attention of the Senators and the few sensible critics of our rules to the fact that the wide latitude of debate has given you time to adjust your differences and made possible at least a less dishonorable and ignominious surrender of your plighted faith than would have resulted had you followed the lead of our illustrious President.

Senators may come and go, as they do come and go with each passing year, but the wholesome latitude in debate afforded by our rules tends to avoid much unnecessary friction and insures a higher degree of efficiency in governmental affairs than could otherwise be obtained.

Mr. President, I am going to offer a suggestion regarding the tolls matter that I do not think has yet been made, a matter of my own observation and experience as a Member of Congress, and I am particularly pleased that so many Senators are doing me the honor to listen to my remarks. I am especially pleased that both the Senators from New York are here, and I invite the attention of the senior Senator [Mr. ROOT] to a phase of this situation which he has evidently overlooked in the consideration of this bill.

What was the political atmosphere in which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was prepared? I was a Member of Congress in 1900. My honored friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who sits near me, was a Member of the House at that time. What was the condition of the public mind when the present Hay-Pauncefote treaty was prepared? Perhaps the answer would throw a truer light upon the negotiations than many of the indefinite impressions now retailed for partisan purposes. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty still encumbered the records of the State Department. Officially it was not dead, although it had long since fallen into a subconscious state, but the great popular branch of Congress deliberately ignored it. While the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, prepared by Secretary Hay, was pending in the Senate, the House of Representatives drove a steel blade squarely into the vitals of these bastard laws, and in defiance of the customs of stilted chancelleries spoke the voice of indignant protest against further artfulness or diplomatic chicane in dealing with a principle of government so important to us all.

I shall never forget the fruitless endeavor of my distinguished and honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who sits by my side, to check that ruthless onslaught against the diplomatic plans of Lord Pauncefote and Secretary Hay. Again and again he tried to rally the scattered remnants of peace, but even the talismanic voice of his party chieftain was drowned in the roar of the victor's cry, and the advancing hosts of American fair play scaled the mountain peaks of parliamentary obstruction as though they were paper barriers intended only to restrain children at play. Protests were vain, the Secretary of State was engulfed, and a resolution passed the House directing the President of the United States to enter upon the construction of a canal across the Republic of Nicaragua without waiting for the consent of any foreign Government. Did not the honored Senator from New York overlook this important historical fact in his brilliant description of the situation surrounding the negotiations at the time this treaty was made?

How well I remember that debate. My friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] voted to thus outrage the diplomatic policy of the country, and seemingly he did it with great joy. My honored friend from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], a new Member of this body but at that time a Member of the House, voted to pass the Nicaragua canal bill in the teeth of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and in defiance of the engagement of Hay and Pauncefote, not even according that treaty the merit of proper and appropriate funeral rites. My honored friend from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] voted for that bill and is still consistently battling for freedom from foreign fetters. Is it not significant that in open defiance of both treaties, one old and decrepit, the other young but wither-wrung, the President of the United States was by an overwhelming vote directed to acquire the territory and enter upon the construction of that canal without further parleying or delay?

Sir, that was the situation which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] failed to recall when he made his notable contribution to this debate a few days ago. We who were here remember the scurrying about on the floor of the House of Representatives for negative votes. We remember how the leaders endeavored to line up Members against that international outrage, as it was called. And yet the bill passed that body by the tremendous majority of 224 to 36 and left no room for doubt as to the purpose of the American people regarding this canal project across Central America or through the Isthmus. Here is our second declaration of independence; listen, Senators:

A bill to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to acquire from the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, for and in behalf of the United States, control of such portion of territory now belonging to Costa Rica and Nicaragua as may be desirable and necessary on which to excavate, construct, and defend a canal of such depth and capacity as will be sufficient for the movements of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from a point near Greytown, on the Caribbean Sea, via Lake Nicaragua, to Breto, on the Pacific Ocean; and such sum as may be necessary to secure such control is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Does the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] or my honored friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] doubt for one moment that that bill when enacted into law would have sounded the death knell of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, or its offspring, the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty? The nature of this action was flashed over the ocean, was promptly conveyed to the British foreign office, and fully understood by Mr. Choate, the American ambassador. The effect of our action was instantaneous and electric. Senators who have proclaimed their devotion to our treaty contracts with foreign nations, Senators who honor me with their presence here this afternoon, voted without the slightest hesitation to pass this drastic and revolutionary measure proposed by Mr Hepburn, of Iowa, on the 2d day of May, 1900. From that moment a new diplomatic alignment was imperative, if Great Britain was to save anything from this unexpected rebuff.

The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, then pending in the Senate, attempted to perpetuate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and give it new life; there is no question about that. That treaty proposed to deprive us of the right to fortify our canal; that treaty gave England the joint right with the United States to fix regulations for its management and control; that treaty was a copartnership with England from the first line to the last, and I have felt that some of the distinguished gentlemen who have taken such prominent part in this discussion may have had a part in the framing of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I could not believe that my experienced and sagacious friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], had had any hand in the framing of that treaty so generally regarded with disfavor through the country; I could not believe that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] had had any hand in framing that treaty; and yet, as I now recall, the Senator from New York was then Secretary of War and sat at the Cabinet table with Mr. Hay and must have known all about that first treaty. If he consented to it, then he consented to the perpetuation of the odious Clayton-Bulwer treaty and a perpetual alliance with Great Britain in the management of this great American enterprise.

Mr. President, what did the Senate do with that treaty? It promptly extracted its vitals, reduced its impertinent swagger, and left the enacting clause only as a warning epitaph to its authors. It was emphatically un-American, and was so denominated over and over again here; and, Mr. President and Senators, that was the atmosphere in which the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was prepared; that was the attitude of the American public mind toward this question; that was the condition of public opinion here. Is it a stretch of the imagination to say that nothing less than a complete abdication by England would have been acceptable to the American people?

Who voted against the Hepburn bill? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], sitting by my side, was one of the little band of martyrs who voted against it and tried to stop its passage. He was an intimate personal friend of the American negotiator and was appealed to by the Department of State when the waters became rough; but the men in the House of Representatives at that time who voted for the Hepburn Nicaraguan bill while the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was pending include that stalwart defender of the President in this unpatriotic struggle, Mr. Burleson, now Postmaster General of the United States; Mr. BANKHEAD, now Senator from Alabama; Mr. SHAFROTH, now Senator from Colorado; Mr. WILLIAMS, now Senator from Mississippi; Mr. SWANSON, now Senator from Virginia, and numerous others. Their solicitude about our treaty obligations seems to have developed suddenly, after an injection of a special brand of presidential serum, calculated to allay party pain and perfidy.

England was plainly discouraged in the face of this Yankee demonstration; the great popular branch of Congress had literally torn her hopes to tatters, and Lord Lansdowne and Lord Pauncefote began to take soundings on the diplomatic sea, where new and threatening shoals had been revealed by the lowering tide.

But, Senators, the vote was only 224 to 36, just a sandstorm on the desert, or a hurricane at Hatteras; that was all; only a slight indication of cosmic chaos. Is it any wonder that the able advocates of this bill should have overlooked this interesting page of history while calling our attention to the sacrifices made by England in surrendering her rights under the treaty of 1850?

Mr. President, are we not forced to the conclusion that the British foreign office fully understood then, if never before, that if they were to get anything at all as the result of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, if they were to have any interest at all in the canal that we were about to construct, all England could hope to save would be the voluntary neutralization of the canal and just treatment as one of our customers in its use? There is not a line or a syllable in the correspondence which shows otherwise, and until American propagandists set their subsidized printing presses to work and American Senators took the side of England no confusion existed anywhere as to our rights or our duty. President Taft fixed the charges on foreign shipping, and Congress and the President gave the vessels flying our flag and engaged in purely domestic commerce from port to port the same privileges at Panama as we accord them on the Mississippi, the Ohio, the St. Marys, and all other internal waterways. President Wilson approved this plan in speeches during his campaign for the Presidency; the Baltimore platform, upon which he stood, approved it in the following terse and vigorous language:

We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

His speech of acceptance said that the plan did not go quite far enough to rehabilitate the merchant marine.

Former President Roosevelt, who made the present treaty possible, approved the exemption of our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls, saying in his speech accepting the presidential nomination at the hands of the Progressive Party, August 6, 1912:

The Panama Canal must be fortified. It would have been criminal to build it if we were not prepared to fortify it and to keep our Navy at such a pitch of strength as to render it unsafe for any foreign power to attack us and get control of it. * * * We have a perfect right to permit our coastwise traffic with which there can be no competition by the merchant marine of any foreign nation, so that there is no discrimination against any foreign navy to pass through that canal on any terms we charge, and I personally think that no tolls should be charged on such traffic.

Mr President, these declarations were a sufficient notice to Great Britain that we would never again enter into any arrangement for joint control of this proposed waterway. Senators, what base treachery is at the bottom of this cowardly surrender now?

What gives this treaty question so much prominence at this time? The President of the United States, in his speech of acceptance addressed to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the other members of the notification committee, did not think that we were conferring any great privilege upon our coastwise shipping by the exemption. He did not feel that our national honor was involved then; the plaudits of the multitude in his campaign easily drowned the roar of the British lion then. What did he say in his speech of acceptance to Mr. JAMES and his associates about it? Listen, Senators:

The very fact that we have at last taken the Panama Canal seriously in hand and are vigorously pushing it toward completion is eloquent of our reawakened interest in international trade. We are not building the canal and pouring out millions upon millions of money upon its construction merely to establish a water connection between the two coasts of the continent, important and desirable as that may be, particularly from the point of view of naval defense. It is meant to be a great international highway. It would be a little ridiculous if we should build it and then have no ships to send through it. There have been years when not a single ton of freight passed through the great Suez Canal in an American bottom, so empty are the seas of our ships and seamen. We must mean to put an end to that kind of thing or we would not be cutting a new canal at our very doors merely for the use of our men-of-war. We shall not manage the revival by the mere paltry device of tolls—by the mere paltry device of tolls.

Paltry device. You would think, from reading his message to Congress and from the speeches of some of our friends who advocate repeal, that this was a gigantic subsidy; that some one was going to reap a tremendous benefit from it; and yet the President, in his speech to Senator JAMES and his associates, said:

We shall not manage the revival by the mere paltry device of tolls. We must build and buy ships in competition with the world.

"A paltry device," he said, and yet he puts forward the repeal of this "paltry device" with great solemnity as the sine quo non of British friendship for us, as the one national favor which will unify the English-speaking people in both hemispheres in bonds of perpetual sympathy and love for all the future generation of men, and virtually says it can be accomplished in no other way. This "paltry device of tolls" which he had pressed forward in the campaign is now to be waived in order to cement the English-speaking race. O Mr. President, I marvel that he should have suggested such a "paltry" sacrifice, so meaningless and of so little advantage to the British Government, as a basis of American and British amity. It must be, Senators, that this waiver means more to England than appears upon the surface; it must be that our President is sorely perplexed; indeed, he admits it; but he does not tell us what it is about. Can it be that he has been reading Jean Paul Richter's dream of crashing worlds and has not yet awakened from its magic spell?

Mr. President, the attitude of the Chief Executive of the country is absolutely inexplainable. In his campaign he approved with great vigor this legislation, then before the House. He said nothing to deter his party associates in the Senate, who were about to ratify what the House had done; the policy pursued was supposedly his. He entered the campaign with the purpose firm in mind to permit the coastwise shipping of our country to enjoy the same privileges in Panama which they enjoy on every other waterway over which our flag is supreme.

He was then in harmony with the American purpose and hostile to the further control in any manner by England of the interoceanic canal. Is there any Senator here who doubts that? I should like to ask any of the numerous Senators who voted for the Hepburn bill in the House of Representatives May 2, 1900, or any other Senator here, if he doubts that the passage of that bill in the House of Representatives was distinctly inimical to the convention of 1850, prepared by Mr. Clayton and Mr. Bulwer? It ended all uncertainty and reflected our unalterable purpose to go into this project alone.

What did the old treaty do? Did the treaty of 1850 preclude the American Government from constructing a canal across the Isthmus of Panama? Certainly not. The treaty of 1850 provided that there should be joint supervision and control on the part of England and the United States over any canal built through Central America via Lake Nicaragua and Lake Managua and the Republic of Nicaragua. There is not a line or a syllable in that treaty which binds us at the Isthmus of Panama. Senators who support the administration may frown, but the treaty itself speaks in unmistakable language, and eminent Senators about me give encouragement to my contentions.

In the eighth article of that convention there was a provision that if any other route through the Isthmus of Panama were to be adopted as a means of communication either by water or rail it should be the subject of future negotiations. But there was no provision against our constructing a canal across the Isthmus of Panama. Central America and Nicaragua are not the Isthmus. Central America and Nicaragua have never been treated as the Isthmus by anyone. The Isthmus in 1850 was that territory controlled by New Granada, and New Granada had given the American Government an exclusive right to build a canal or a railroad across it. A little later Mr. Aspinwall and his associates built a railroad across there. Did Great Britain, through its foreign office, ask the United States to fix rules for its operation? No. Was there any treaty made by England and the United States with reference to its control? No. None was proposed and none was made. We were free to do as we pleased and did it unhampered by England. We had no treaty with England regarding the Isthmus of Panama until the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, now before us, which gives Great Britain only such treatment as is accorded other customers of the United States in the use of the canal. If any Senator here doubts that statement, I invite him to rise and say so. What, will no one venture a contradiction?

The truth is that the only reference made to Panama was in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as I said a moment ago, and that article did not bind us with reference to a canal across the Isthmus, but said that if one was built it would be the subject of future discussion between the two countries, and it was not the subject of negotiations between the two countries until 1901, when this treaty was perfected.

What did the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] mean when he voted in favor of the Hepburn bill in the spring of 1900? Did he mean to violate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without notice or was that act to be the notice? He was not overscrupulous then, and he was not overscrupulous when he voted for free tolls for our coastwise shipping two years ago.

What did my honored friend, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] mean when he voted, on the 2d of May, 1900, to pass the Hepburn bill directing the President to proceed with the construction of a canal across Nicaragua? Did the Senator mean to flaunt his Government in the teeth of Great Britain? Certainly, and he has never made an apology for it and never will; he is too intense in his Americanism.

Mr. President, for 25 years nearly everyone has treated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a dead letter. Mr. Arthur, while he was President, had made a treaty with Nicaragua giving us the right to construct a canal across Nicaragua in defiance of that treaty. Mr. Frelinghuysen, his Secretary of State, said the treaty had no binding effect; that it had outlived its usefulness; and no claim was seriously made on the part of Great Britain that it had any further legal vitality whatever, and yet there were many strong men who regarded it with awe. The learned Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] was one of these. He struggled manfully to maintain his high standard of national virtue. He had offered an amendment proposing that a commission should be appointed to look over the routes; but we had had several commissions, I believe, up to that time, and the country was tired of them. The country was determined to build that canal in 1900.

We had been through the Spanish-American War and knew the necessity of uniting our Atlantic and Pacific ports without the necessity of going around Cape Horn or through the Straits of Magellan. The country was determined to act, and the desperate attempt of Great Britain to save some little remnant of her influence in whatever canal might be constructed between the two oceans commands my unadulterated admiration. The American people, however, would not stand for delay any longer; and in that situation Mr. Hay was directed to proceed in the new light of American public opinion. The second Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made not in the atmosphere of the convention of 1850, not in the fog of the convention of February, 1900, but in the light of this national declaration upon the part of the popular branch of Congress. In such a situation, is it any wonder that Great Britain should seek to save just as much as she could get out of the wreck of her hopes?

What did she save? She saved neutrality. I think the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] said that neutrality meant that we were all on an equality at the Isthmus. I do not believe the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] indorses that definition of neutrality.

Switzerland and Belgium are both neutral States by contract. Does anybody deny that both Belgium and Switzerland can regulate their domestic affairs in their own way? The fact that they are neutral simply means that they will not pick a quarrel with the other States that have contracted to help maintain their neutrality or show preference between them. That is all. It does not mean a surrender of sovereignty. It means that they have elected to stand neutral between contending forces. It is an alliance of peace, not a declaration of war.

No one doubts that Belgium has absolute control over her domestic affairs, notwithstanding she is a neutral State. Luxemburg regulates her own domestic affairs and is content. Neutrality simply means that where there is a conflict between States which are its friends it will not use military or other force to influence the contest.

John Bassett Moore, in his very able elucidation of this principle, says:

A State is neutral which chooses to take no part in a war; and persons and property are termed neutral which belong to a State occupying this position.

In the name of Heaven, if we contracted to neutralize the canal at the Isthmus as between our customers, are we forbidden to exercise all the rights of sovereignty ourselves? Certainly not. There is no condition of neutrality anywhere which recognizes any such principle in the law of nations. If we were a semisovereign State, if we were controlled by a protectorate, our situation would be vastly different.

Belgium is as distinctly an independent State to-day as the United States of America. Does anyone doubt it? She makes treaties with other nations; she passes her own laws; she ac-credits her ministers to foreign courts; we accredit our minister to Belgium; and yet Belgium is a neutral State, because she has elected not to war upon her neighbors. We are neutral in our canal among our customers because our customers use the canal under conditions laid down by our Government. That American territory is calm and unvexed and tranquil; it can not become the football of warring nations and be useful to mankind. None of our patrons could enter the canal and do damage there without inviting at once the vengeance of the entire world. We said the canal should be neutralized among our customers; but this duty rests upon ourselves. Our right to protect it and govern it and control it is not challenged anywhere, and we have no constitutional right to surrender this sovereignty. It is little less than insulting for any Senator on this floor to ask us, in the interest of peace, to waive our sovereign rights lawfully acquired on the Isthmus of Panama.

Mr. President, all England saved out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was the principle of neutralization and equal treatment with other customers of the canal in the matter of tolls.

My honored friend from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], an able lawyer, with whom I have served for many years, nods his assent to this suggestion. We accord to Germany the same treatment that we do to England by our law now upon the statute books. We are asked to do no more, and American Senators have no right to brief this case for England.

Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] seems to be examining my record, or the record of the House of Representatives, made in May, 1900.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; the record of the House, not of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very glad he has it, and I am perfectly willing he shall explain to the Senate just how much deference he then showed for solemn foreign contracts.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] seems to be agitated about something. [Laughter.] I cheerfully yield if he desires to make an observation; but in what I have to say about the Clayton-Bulwer treaty I acquit him of any ruthless disregard for international conventions.

The truth is that he resisted it with all his might, and he gathered together, as he usually does, a select company of rather distinguished gentlemen who, most of the time, are obliged to satisfy themselves in the minority, and I regret that in this instance his tribe seems to have increased.

If Great Britain had no rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty upon the Isthmus of Panama, then she sacrificed none when the treaty was nullified in 1901, and she needs no healing balm now to soothe her anger over certain slights put upon her citizens in our neighboring Republic south of the Rio Grande.

I charged one day, while sitting next to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], that neither one of them could have known about the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or they would have counseled Secretary Hay against it, knowing that it could not be ratified in the Senate, and thus he would have been saved the humiliation of seeing his treaty so mangled by the Senate that it was beyond the power of Great Britain to recognize it when it finally reached the British foreign office. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said, "Oh, no; you are mistaken. I knew about the first treaty." I said I could not believe that a Senator so wise and so powerful could have known what was then in contemplation. But he did and helped to make it fairly acceptable. I think he reported the treaty to the Senate. That treaty was as objectionable as its earlier prototype and was proposed in the guise of a friendly intermingling of the two English-speaking races. The treaty of Clayton and Bulwer was in defiance of American public opinion. The Senator from Michigan at that time, Lewis Cass, hauled John M. Clayton, of Delaware, over the coals in this body with a vigor and earnestness and an intensity of Americanism which left no room for doubt that Mr. Cass regarded it as a betrayal of our rights.

Is there a Senator in this Chamber now, North or South, East or West, old or young, distinguished or with a reputation yet to make, who believes that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was a desirable one for the United States? Is there a Senator in this Chamber who would have voted for its ratification if he had been here at that time? Senators, why do not some of you who have been defending its sanctity and significance rise? Is there a Senator in this Chamber who believes that it was conceived in wisdom?

England had been hovering around Central America for more than a hundred years before that treaty was made, seeking strategic points of advantage. Great Britain had asked Spain to give a few English people the right to go down the coast of Central America and cut a few mahogany logs. Spain said they did not want them to do so, because they might seek to assert some sovereign right over the territory, but England said, "No; we just want these people to cut a few logs." They went in there and cut a few logs, and put up a few fences, besides, and in every crisis since 1763, when Spain gave these English woodsmen a license to cut logs on the small islands in Fonseca Bay, Great Britain has fortified her position. In 1783 she disclaimed any ulterior purpose in remaining, and three years later agreed to leave. Even the British House of Lords questioned the justness of the claims of the King, while two acts of Parliament conceded England had no sovereign right or dominion over Honduras, and yet the foreign office persisted in staying there.

Mr. LEWIS. May I interrupt the Senator to ask as to the accuracy of an historical reference made by him?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have known the Senator from Illinois now for a generation; I served with him in the House of Representatives nearly a generation ago. He has known me intimately all this time, and this is the first time in all our acquaintance that he ever questioned my accuracy.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am amazed at the Senator from Illinois to thus seek to cast some suspicion upon the historical fact which I have just stated.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to elaborate a little further by asking him the query which I rose to propound, if I do not interrupt his trend of argument?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very glad to have the Senator interrupt me. I yield cheerfully to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to reciprocate the exquisite sentiment expressed by the Senator. I meant to ask him whether he has not fallen into a slight error of memory.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I have not fallen into any error.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator anticipates me. He probably means if he fell into an error before, it was not a slight one.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I would not admit that; but if the Senator feels that his question is appropriate, I will let it stand.

Mr. LEWIS. I will withdraw the observation that the Senator has himself admitted any former error. Is he not in error as to the position of Senator Cass? My memory of the history is that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, when it was made a subject of discussion in the Senate, was defended by Mr. Cass and was opposed by Mr. Douglas, the Senator then from Illinois, who had devised for himself a policy known as the American policy, which at that time opposed the execution of the treaty or the entrance upon it, and Mr. Cass, who then represented Michigan, sought to enforce that treaty over the proposition of the Democrat from Illinois, who regarded it as an un-American document.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am very familiar with the attitude of Gen. Cass. The truth about the matter is that Gen. Cass chased Senator Clayton around this Chamber with a cat-o-nine-tails and basted him at every step he took for two or three days; because of his treaty. Mr. Clayton had come to the Senate and was upon equal ground with the Senator from Michigan, and he did it because for the first time he learned that an exchange of notes between Clayton and Bulwer fixed the status of England's claims in British Honduras, and it was a most amazing thing to Senator Cass that an understanding of that kind should have been entered into between the American diplomat and Lord Bulwer. He found great fault with it, and the records of the department indicate that that exchange of notes was so little known that even Mr. Cass with all his shrewdness never knew anything about it until after the treaty was ratified.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly; to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to state that the Senator's statement concerning Mr. Cass's position is confirmed absolutely by the history of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, written by Mr. Travers.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am obliged to the Senator from Colorado. I know that Senator Cass did not know about this side agreement between Clayton and Bulwer, and it was upon that that Great Britain maintained her right to occupy British Honduras. The Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me. I yield to him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I may have read the history of that transaction incorrectly, but my recollection is that Mr. Clayton was very severely criticized because of the part he took in negotiating the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and for the purpose of defending himself he sought election to the Senate. He was elected, and he had a particular animosity toward Mr. Cass and intended to attack Mr. Cass, but because Mr. Cass was at home in attendance upon his sick wife he then sought Mr. Douglas, who was Mr. Cass's chief lieutenant, and the great debate occurred between Mr. Clayton and Mr. Douglas under those circumstances.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; the Senator from New Hampshire, as usual, is entirely correct.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from New Hampshire, whose knowledge of history is so accurate, for a correction of my own view or its confirmation? Am I not right in assuming that Douglas's attitude was one of opposition to that treaty?

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely so.

Mr. LEWIS. Such was my impression.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was one of violent opposition to Mr. Clayton's position.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As I was saying, when interrupted by the Senator from Illinois, the War with Mexico and our acquisition of California was the signal to Great Britain for a renewal of the claims of sovereignty at Greytown and Belize. She could not take her hands off these two points in Central America, although she had many times promised to do so, and when Lord Palmerston learned of the Granada-Nicaragua concessions and the plans of certain citizens of the United States to go ahead with a canal in 1849, he immediately established a protectorate on the Mosquito Coast to head off the pretenses of adventurous North Americans. This was the situation when Clayton and Bulwer got together.

Mr. President, the most caustic arraignment that I have been able to find of the duplicity of England in matters of treaty obligations was uttered by John M. Clayton, of Delaware, and yet he was caught in her meshes.

Spain urged England to quit Honduras and the Mosquito Coast. I will read what Mr. Fox, the British premier, said about the matter on the 18th of July, 1783, when Spain protested, and protested vigorously, that her sovereignty was interfered with, and that England had designs upon that territory.

"Get the treaty signed, no matter under what cost," is the motto of Britain, and a projected canal across Central America stirred her anew.

Mr. President, that marvelous diplomacy for which Britain is noted is a science. It is not a half-hearted, haphazard game of chance. Each succeeding head of the foreign office takes up the game where the last actor left it. It is a science, and each prime minister in England contributes his full share toward the perfection of her diplomacy. That she did not have her own way finally at Panama is no fault of her system; every semblance of virility and genuine Americanism, or, as Representative UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, says, we yield to the "un-American spirit of surrender."

President Wilson says in his message that he wants this done, "right or wrong." Why? To palliate Great Britain? Yes; although she has never asked us to give up the right of sovereignty in that canal. There can be no answer to the splendid argument of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] upon that point; he tore that futile contention into shreds the other day by unanswerable argument.

I would not say anything to reflect upon the President of the United States. He is evidently a cultured and well-meaning man, but he has not the experience, foresight, or the courage of some of his predecessors or he would not have fallen into this grievous and unnecessary error.

Mr. President, his attitude on the tolls question may have been comforting to Great Britain, but it can not be otherwise than disappointing to the people of our country. What caused him to make that utterance? I wish I could give my impression of what drove him to such desperate straits, for I have very pronounced views upon the subject. They were gathered in the presidential presence while sitting as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. Other Senators sitting near me were there. I think I know why he took this step, but, of course, I can not in fairness reveal it; I may, however, with perfect propriety say what is common knowledge to us all, that he was undoubtedly moved to this action by an acute situation at that time existing in Mexico and as a result of a visit of the officers of a Japanese battleship to Gen. Huerta at Mexico City. That visit close upon the heels of a British protest for wrongs inflicted upon her citizens and unavenged by us aroused the keenest suspicions in this Capital, and the presence of a Japanese battleship at Vera Cruz did not accord with our policy of "watchful waiting."

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], sitting near me, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], sitting near me, I think, were both present at that conference, when for the first time the President indicated his intention to ask for repeal of the free-tolls law. What was the mysterious message? I should like to have the historical facts known. I did not hear it all read, but that night decided the fate of this bill. Congress was soon asked to repeal this law. I protested to the President against it, as did other Senators, and said if a future Congress reasserted the principle he would ask us to repeal. England would then have a grievance against us which did not exist at that moment. But the President was in trouble, and I was there reminded of a former occupant of the White House, who, when the French were upon the soil of Mexico, when their menacing guns sought to assert authority over a sister Republic in the Western Hemisphere, when France was begging the United States to recognize belligerency, that President Lincoln firmly said, "I can not do it; I will not do it; you must leave Mexico." Over and over again France begged Mr. Lincoln, as he was upon the verge of a war in his own country, to yield; but with all the burdens that were then upon him, he still had courage enough and fortitude enough and red blood enough to assert an American doctrine in the face of possible international complications, and it was the insistence of Mr. Lincoln that drove the French out of Mexico and kept the Monroe doctrine inviolate.

When the great French soldier De Latour D'Auvergne was the hero of many battles, but remained by his own choice in the ranks, Napoleon gave him a sword and the official title "the first grenadier of France." When he was killed the Emperor ordered that his heart should be intrusted to the keeping of his regiment and that his name should be called at every roll call; that his next comrade should make answer, "Dead upon the field of honor." So, Mr. President, with our martyred and immortal Lincoln, so long as the world lasts, some one of God's creatures, somewhere, in hovel or palace, on mountain or plain, will answer to his name, "Dead upon the field of glory."

Mr. President, I saw the entire diplomatic corps accredited to this Capital go to the White House in 1898 to beg of President McKinley not to go to war with Spain. The press and the country were aroused to a high degree of anxiety over the protest of these foreign powers. I remember distinctly when they entered the front door of the White House; I saw them there. The significance of their visit was reflected in this Chamber, not so much in the other Chamber, where I was then a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as was my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I heard Senators say "We are courting international trouble." The disposition of Spain's colonies had aroused anxiety. The nations of Europe had had their eyes on Cuba for a hundred years. England and France, in 1852, prepared a tripartite agreement, under which they asked the United States to assist in the perpetual government of Cuba for all time. When the British foreign office was asked about their anxiety with reference to Cuba, the Earl of Malmesbury replied "that the nation possessing Cuba might either protect or obstruct the commercial routes from one ocean to the other." Spain was being hard pressed by her creditors then, but the United States refused to enter into such an arrangement, the President saying that "the convention proposed would be viewed with disfavor by the United States Senate." Think of it, Senators! President Fillmore actually consulted the wishes of this body! How strange and ancient that practice has become! War with Spain now became inevitable. Senator Proctor's simple story of wrong and suffering brought the country to a realization of its duty, and the crimes committed by Spanish rulers could not longer be tolerated, while the destruction of the Maine inflamed the public mind to the fighting point.

What do you think President McKinley said when all of these diplomats went to the White House and begged him to desist? Do you think that he convened Congress in joint session and told it to undo some American policy forthwith, "right or wrong"? Did William McKinley call the two Houses together and then propose to them that we should yield up some measure of our national sovereignty in "ungrudging measure" in support of the foreign policy of the administration lest he should "not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence"? No! A thousand times no! President McKinley looked these ambassadors straight in the eye and said to them: "Gentlemen, this is very courteous and thoughtful of you, but this is an American matter, and we will attend to it ourselves." And the diplomatic corps took their hats and returned to their embassies and their legations. We, the representatives of the people, proceeded here in this Capitol to draft a joint resolution fixing the purpose and the policy of the American Government with reference to Spain in this hemisphere. I was here when President Cleveland called England to book for her pretensions in Venezuela, and the country rang with his praise.

My mind also goes back to the time when Perdicaris was held in bondage by a Tangier bandit. President Roosevelt did not wait to consult the convenience of bandits or what the effect would be on a personal foe, but he sent a cablegram to our consul general at Tangiers, saying "I want Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead." Shades of Benton, upon what strange times have we come? Benton murdered, Americans slaughtered, and no reparation demanded in our name, because, forsooth, Villa is engaged in a holy cause. The Americanism of Lincoln and Cleveland, McKinley and Roosevelt cries out in despair; while they were in the presidential chair the standing of an American citizen in any part of the world was never questioned.

But President Wilson, in order to compose certain differences growing out of Mexican affairs, which have been made more complex by his halting and hesitating policy, calls us together immediately after the officers of a Japanese battleship paid a visit to Gen. Huerta, and asks us to surrender up a part of our sovereignty in the canal which we have just built across the Isthmus of Panama in the interest of peace, "right or wrong."

Why, Mr. President, we could have gone on and built that canal, just as my friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] wanted to do it in May, 1909. If those Senators believed as they then acted, why do they not vote as they believe now?

I do not know whether I have made my point clear, but nowhere in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were we inhibited from building the Panama Canal; article 8 only provided that if we decided to go that way, rather than across Nicaragua, where England had territory, it would be the subject of future negotiations. I am very sure I am right about that. If there is any Senator here who thinks I am not right about it, I will cheerfully yield to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS (to Mr. SMITH of Michigan). Read the clause and you will find that you are wrong.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will read the clause of article 8 I ask the Senator from Mississippi, is not that the only article that refers to Panama?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; the whole treaty applies to a canal anywhere across the Isthmus.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, you evidently did not think so in May, 1900. I will see about that.

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty—being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity—

Begins the treaty—

And so forth. I do not want to read it all, but in the first line of the first article of the treaty it is provided:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal—

What is "the said ship canal"? A—ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean.

That is what the treaty says.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From what treaty is the Senator reading?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am reading from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator was referring to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I repeat:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal, agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America.

Where is there in that language any inhibition upon the right of the United States to build a canal in some other place than in the territory described? Where is there in this treaty any inhibition against our Government building a canal or other means of communication at any other place than the places mentioned, namely, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America? Central America is not the Isthmus of Panama, it has no political connection with the Isthmus of Panama, and it had not at the time this treaty was made in 1850. England had rights in Nicaragua; and those rights she was protecting, but she had no rights in Panama. Article 8 does provide that the United States and Great Britain—hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America.

But that does not rise to the dignity of a contract. An agreement to agree is not an agreement. We said we would enter into future negotiations, but we were never asked to do so. An American railroad was constructed across the Isthmus and operated for more than 40 years without the slightest interference upon the part of Great Britain in the American right to regulate and control it.

No, Mr. President, England had a very bad case in the estimation of the House of Representatives in May, 1900. England was in a very trying situation in 1901, and she devoted herself to the purpose of getting what little she could out of it. She got the principle of neutralization, which only means that we will stand apart from her controversies; and she got equality of tolls among our customers, never questioning our right to prefer our own ships in our own way. May I ask Senators this plain, direct, and simple question: If the construction now placed upon this treaty by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], with his great learning and ability, and by other Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, had been the construction placed upon the treaty when we were providing the money to build the canal, would there have been a dollar appropriated for its construction?

If we were considering now de novo the question of building a canal across the Isthmus of Panama under the strained construction which is sought to be given to our treaty rights, would Senators vote the money necessary to build it? I think not.

I was among those who voted the first money to build the canal. I would not have voted five cents to build it under the construction now placed upon our rights by the President. Oh, no, Mr. President, the truth is that the Chief Executive has been unduly alarmed by an acute but temporary situation in one of our neighboring Republics. He has been somewhat overanxious about the attitude of certain European and oriental States with reference to that controversy, and in his dilemma is seeking an ally to compose those differences. If Mr. Lincoln had taken the same course, he would have pleased France and England, for England came with France to Mexico just before the Civil War, but when she found the purpose of Maximilian's soldiers England withdrew. President Lincoln could see through the thinly veneered plans of these European States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Michigan intimate that the President of the United States is seeking to make an ally of England, and, to compensate her for an alliance, is seeking to surrender a right of the American Government?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If that idea has been suggested, the Senator from Illinois is entitled to the credit for it, for he is the only man that ever made that statement on this floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Michigan say to me that I ever made that statement?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do. Standing in his place a few weeks ago the Senator stated that, at the risk of offending somebody, he was going to speak the truth, though it slew him, or something to that effect. The Senator then filled the air with dire prophecy about our relations to the outside world, creating undue alarm in our own country.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire, if I am not interrupting the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator is interrupting me, and I am sorry that he persists in doing it, because I am very weary.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to give the Senator now a little rest by asking him to pause for a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would rather have the Senator speak in his own time, if he will permit me.

Mr. LEWIS. No; at this particular time I must correct the statement of the Senator, for he has inadvertently placed upon my statement a construction which I assure him can not be placed on any statement which has ever fallen from me in this place.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator want me to read what he said?

Mr. LEWIS. No; my memory is accurate, my conduct has been just, and I have no reason for forgetting it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well; I will not read it now.

Mr. LEWIS. I will recall it to the Senator, if he will permit me. The Senator said, if I understood him, that I in my place had said that I would take an opportunity to disclose the truth though it wrecked me, or something of that sort.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As a matter of fact, the Senator quoted from Shakespeare, and just at this moment the quotation does not come back to me.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator is confirming me in what I said, that his memory is inaccurate as to this matter; but I am not seeking——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, do not take unfair advantage of my courtesy.

Mr. LEWIS. It is impossible for my feeble mind to assail the eminent Senator's argument.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it falls of its own weight, I ask the Senator to let it alone. Why does the "galled jade wince"? If I am not saying anything that impresses the Senator, why not let me go ahead unheeded?

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to say to the Senator that the "galled jade" does not wince because my withers are not unwrung.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mine are pretty nearly wrung, but the Senator may proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to correct the impression the Senator has unhappily created, that I had said somewhere something from which the deduction can be drawn that there has been an alliance between this country and England, or between the President and England, touching the Panama Canal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to say that the able Senator is quite in error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am reminded by my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND], who also heard the same statement, that the Senator said, "I will speak to thee though it blast me."

Mr. LEWIS. That is from Mr. Hamlet.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I did not know Hamlet personally, but I think what the Senator said blasted him. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator. I have just a word to say, and then I will not interrupt further. That is, the Senator is in error, unhappily for lack of memory, as to any assertion from me——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am responsible for my errors.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I am not intimating that the Senator is not responsible.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want the Senator to become chronic in his faultfinding; it would be contrary to his true nature.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely want to make this observation——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan refuses to yield. The Senator from Illinois will please take his seat.

Mr. LEWIS. I simply wish to say——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to yield further now.

Mr. LEWIS. I simply wish to say that the Senator is in error in assuming that any remark of that kind was made by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan refuses to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to say that I shall look up the quotation accurately before I print my remarks to-night, and if I find that the Senator from Illinois did not horrify the peaceful feelings of this Chamber by a reference to our diplomatic chaos I will take my statement out of the RECORD.

Mr. LEWIS. I referred to the diplomatic situation, but I am talking now about the Senator's reference to an "alliance between the President and England."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not say there was any alliance between the President and England.

Mr. LEWIS. Or that he sought such.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not say that.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I will tell the Senator from Illinois that Senators of his party, when the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty came here, had no hesitation in saying that there was an alliance between President McKinley and England. Does the Senator deny that? I have heard it over and over again.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Simply to confirm the recollection of the Senator, I wish to say that a reference to the Democratic national platform of 1900 will show a condemnation of the Government respecting its proposed treaty with Great Britain at that time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York. Democratic platforms usually reflect the passing gloom. I have such high respect for my friend from Illinois that I do not wish to put him in a wrong light, and I know he does not wish to put me in a wrong light. I do say that when the first contract between Hay and Pauncefote was made it was generally believed throughout the country that an alliance had been made between Great Britain and the United States; and it was only the independence and fortitude and courage of Senators, some of whom are in my presence at this moment, that saved us from a most humiliating spectacle with reference to that treaty.

Is there a Senator on this floor who would vote for the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty now? Not one; not one. Why do they vote to repeal this law? Not because it is the habit of our fellow Senators upon the other side to give up anything, ordinarily, but because they have been commanded to do it, "right or wrong," in the interest of that "larger but undefined policy" wrapped up in the presidential bosom. What must we surrender next? What is the next thing for us to give up in the interest of peace? Are you going to surrender the canal just upon the eve of our celebration of its completion, when our hearts are filled with pride over the magnitude of that accomplishment, after all the money for its construction has been raised out of the pockets of the American people; and, now, do you propose to turn over to Great Britain its joint control for all future generations of men? Shame! Shame!

What will the doctor do next? I do not think he is a good diagnostician. If you stub your toe, I should expect him to doctor your brain.

Are we alone in the world? Have we no friends among the great family of nations? There was a time when our friends could be numbered in every part of the world. If we have lost them, we have lost them because we have not treated them all alike, large and small. We have not had one undeviating rule. We have been bungling and stumbling for over a year, and to-day, if we stand alone, our isolation is preferable to buying temporary allies at public expense.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think, or has the Senator any reason to suppose, that we have lost the traditional friendship of Russia or France or Germany because of anything we have done up to the present time?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, in answer to the direct inquiry of the Senator from New Hampshire, I am obliged to say in truth that we passed laws in open defiance of Russia; we have offended her to the heart—Russia, which had been our friend in time of greatest need. When the diplomacy of our country could not stop the construction of British privateers for use against us in the War of the Rebellion, when the voice of our ambassador at the Court of St. James was powerless, the voice of Russia was heard in our defense, and had much to do with stopping the work upon British privateers and turning the tide of battle in our favor. I speak of this because I know it from the lips of one of the most eminent divines who ever graced the pulpit in God's service to humanity. I heard Dr. T. De Witt Talmage say—in fact, he told it to me, not in confidence, but with pride—that the old Emperor of Russia told him the contents of the sealed orders which he gave his admirals when they started for American waters at a critical time in our national existence, when British interference in behalf of the South seemed to have gone to the danger point, that Russian battleships should fire upon any foreign foe that attempted to interfere with the Government of Abraham Lincoln.

I say this in memory of my beloved friend Dr. Talmage, whom I knew intimately in his lifetime. He told me this upon his return from Russia, where he was the honored guest of the old Czar Nicholas for many days, and I never have forgotten it. Russia does not have to do over and over again courtesies for this country to deserve our good will and obtain, at least, fair treatment for herself in matters of international concern.

No, Mr. President; I can not say that there is no feeling of ill will toward us. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I do not believe it is very strong against us. The American traveler formerly found everywhere a feeling of cordiality and good will toward our country, but we were then, however, pursuing an American policy and treating the world justly and fairly—no entangling alliances, no enemies to punish. Our laws were uniform, and special favors were few.

I think favoritism a mistaken policy of government, the breeding ground of jealousy and hate. The teachings of the great Virginia sage and father of our country still ring true to the spirit of our institutions. No matter what the President says, the world is not united against us on this matter. I indorse all that was said the other day by my honored friend from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I do not believe there is on record with the President of the United States a protest from any Government in the world against our policy at Panama, except the half-hearted and weak protest which Mr. Innes made in behalf of Great Britain, largely because he was asked to do it by the premier of Canada.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Michigan does not quote me with absolute accuracy.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not mean to quote the exact words of the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said that I knew of no protest from any nation, including Great Britain, challenging our right to exempt our coastwise traffic from the burden of tolls through the Panama Canal. There is a very emphatic protest against our right to give the President authority to discriminate in favor of our foreign shipping.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, that is the statement I desire to approve. If there is any such protest I think we ought to have it. We are entitled to have it. The Vice President and the Speaker of the House were entitled to it. The Committee on Foreign Relations were entitled to it.

I do not think, however, that England contemplated quarreling with us over the tolls matter. I think she was asked to do this by Canada. It is a singular thing, but it is the truth, that Mexico upon our south and Canada upon our north—Mexico with probably fourteen or fifteen million people and Canada with nearly 10,000,000 people—are exercising more influence over the internal affairs of the United States of America than the rest of the world.

The other day I interrupted the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and stated my impression that Canada had initiated this entire proceeding, and now I am going to give the reason for the charge.

I quote from a cable:

London, July 4, 1912—

We passed that law on August 24, 1912.

PREMIER BORDEN IN LONDON—THREE CANADIAN MINISTERS WITH HIM—MUCH INTEREST IN THE VISIT.

LONDON, July 4, 1912.

Robert L. Borden, the Canadian premier, with his colleagues, J. D. Hazen, minister of marine; C. J. Doherty, minister of justice; and L. P. Pelletier, postmaster general, arrived here this afternoon * * *.

Mr. Borden is the most heralded colonial visitor to come to London for years. The press and public are making much of his pronouncement, "I stand for a great navy," which is interpreted to mean that Canada is prepared to make a handsome contribution to the British Navy in the shape of two more dreadnaughts. * * * Among the many subjects to be discussed between the Canadian statesmen and the British Government is the proposal of the Senate committee in Washington that no ship owned by a railroad shall be allowed to use the Panama Canal.

Before returning to Canada Mr. Borden intends to visit Paris to discuss trade relations with the French Government, and the question of steamship connection between Canada and France.

[From the New York Times, Friday, July 5, 1912.]

ENGLAND ASKS CANAL BILL DELAY—REQUESTS THAT LEGISLATION BE HELD UP PENDING A FORMAL NOTE—MAY OBJECT TO TOLLS—ACTION SAID TO BE UNPRECEDENTED—BILL EXPECTED TO PASS AT THIS SESSION.

WASHINGTON, July 10, 1912.

* * * The notification from the British embassy that there was a desire to have the matter considered diplomatically was received this afternoon by mail from Michell Innes, the chargé of the embassy, who is spending the summer at Kineo, Me. Mr. Huntington Wilson, the Acting Secretary of State, promptly sent a note to Senator BRANDEGEE, chairman of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, informing him of the new turn in Panama Canal affairs, and submitted to him precisely as he had received it the request of the British Government.

The canal bill is now before Mr. BRANDEGEE'S committee and has the prospect of prompt consideration and a favorable report within a very few days.

The British request came probably just in the nick of time, if it is to have the effect of delaying consideration * * *.

It is a fair guess that study of the question has tended to satisfy the British diplomats that the case is not a foregone conclusion for the British contention, and the best way to hold ground is to take it early in the game by a protest, even at the risk of the charge of interfering in our internal affairs.

[From the New York Times, Thursday, July 11, 1912.]

ENGLAND A MEDDLER IS WASHINGTON VIEW.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 11, 1912.

* * * It is understood that Ambassador Bryce discussed the matter of canal tolls with Count Bernstorff, the German ambassador, and Mr. Jusserand, the French ambassador, several months ago.

LONDON, July 12, 1912.

London Times editorial says submit to arbitration.

Morning Post editorial commenting on the same subject hopes that the British Government will stand firm in defense of the shipping interest of the Empire.

LONDON, Friday, July 12, 1912.

There are other points, however, about which the British foreign office, through the embassy at Washington, has addressed the United States Government; and since the arrival here of the Canadian premier, Mr. Borden, the question of the regulations in regard to steamers owned by railroads has been taken up; Canada has protested to the home Government on the ground that these regulations are inimical to her interest.

Senators, Senators, has it come to the point where our nearest neighbor on the north is to dictate our relations with England? We have always been kind to Canada. We have always been indulgent with her. She is our neighbor. I live near her border. In the name of all that is good, however, are they to influence England's course toward us? Must all our relations revolve around Canada?

O Senators, Senators, is it possible that we must now back somersault for the edification of the diplomatic world? We were asked to submit to arbitration, yet with hot foot Senators would have us hastily do the Executive will.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In connection with what my colleague is saying it might be well to understand also that at the time the bill of 1912 was being considered by the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals a representative of the Pacific Mail Co., which is owned by the Union Pacific Railroad Co., was before that committee most of the time. He was contending against the provision that would prevent railroad-owned boats going through the canal. After it was determined that the provision was going to be included in the bill he is reported to have gone to Canada and from there to England, and a statement was circulated that he was in that country at the time this contest over the Canadian Pacific Railroad was presented to Great Britain.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am obliged to my colleague. He has contributed a most valuable piece of historical information at this point, and I thank him for it. The London Times says, "Submit to arbitration"; administration Senators say, "Pass the bill"; while distinguished Senators who sympathize with England put their propaganda before the British public.

Our tolls are so generous that the income will barely pay the annual expense of operation, while Great Britain imposes tolls for the use of the Suez Canal sufficient to pay the expense of operation and large dividends to the stockholders, of which she is the principal one. French money built the Suez Canal, but on its completion English money held control and dominated it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. In connection with the statement just made by the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], it ought not to be forgotten that in Lord Grey's letter, which fully developed the British position, he said:

I assume that the provision in the canal act excluding railroad-owned or railroad-controlled ships from the canal does not apply to the Canadian railroads.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When?

Mr. CUMMINS. That happened in November, I think, 1912. "If that part," said he, "of the act does apply to Canadian railroads, Great Britain will have something more to say to the United States." I recall that to the attention of the Senator from Michigan to ask him whether, in his opinion, if he has given study to the question, that part of the act does apply to the Canadian railroads, and to remind him of what I said the other day about it, that there is no question but that the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railroads are both described by the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is some doubt about the meaning of the law; other Governments do not accept the Senator's interpretation.

Now, see what we have done. We have forbidden American railroad-owned vessels from going through the canal, have we not? Did the Senator vote for it? We have allowed railroad-owned vessels under the British flag to go through the canal. There is not a Grand Trunk or a Canadian Pacific Railroad owned vessel that can not pass through that canal under the law as it now stands. In other words, it makes a great deal of difference whether the railroad-owned boat flies the British flag or the American flag. We may keep our commerce from the enjoyment of unrestricted privileges at Panama, but we can not enforce the same rule against railroad boats owned in England, Germany, or France. There is no law on the statute books—one can not be passed—which will reach a railroad-owned vessel under a foreign flag. What becomes of equality of treatment among your customers when you can do that? The Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk may send their ships through this canal at pleasure, but American railroad-owned vessels must continue to go around Cape Horn.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator has now spoken for several hours and has not quite completed his observations. I understand it is the desire to occupy a brief time with an executive session.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to perfect the amendment which I offered to-day so that it may appear in the RECORD in its perfected form. There is a mistake in the amendment. I had it ratified, speaking of the treaty of the 18th of November, 1901. That was the day when it was signed in duplicate. It should read ratified the 21st day of February, 1902, and between the word "to" and the word "exempt" I wish to add "discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting."

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator will have the amendment printed?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am offering it so that it may be printed in its perfected form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The correction suggested by the Senator from North Carolina will be made, and the amendment as modified will be printed.

Mr. SIMMONS's amendment as modified is as follows:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified the 21st day of February, 1902, or otherwise to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal, or as in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaty, or otherwise, with respect to the sovereignty over or the ownership, control, and management of said canal and the regulation of the conditions or charges of traffic through the same.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield the floor?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I do not yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the Senator from Michigan yielded the floor?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not yield the floor, but I would do so for a recess or an executive session. I am tired, and if I may be permitted to resume my remarks in the morning, I shall not take long. I would prefer to do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, we have had about three weeks of this debate, and it is about time that we were getting through with it somehow.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will not finish until to-morrow, Mr. President. I have the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor. If so, while on my feet——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator wants me to go ahead, I will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make a few remarks in response to some of the historical references——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. All right; the Senator can do that to-morrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not see any reason for taking a recess in order that either one of us may speak.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will go ahead to-night if the Senator wants me to proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would rather agree with the Senator that we shall vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought I was to yield for the purpose of an executive session.

Mr. SHIVELY. Do I understand that the Senator from Michigan does not desire to complete his speech this afternoon?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did intend to complete it. If I am delaying Senators——

Mr. SHIVELY. I do not think there is any objection to the Senator concluding to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would prefer to finish my remarks to-morrow. I will not take a long time. If a short executive session or anything else is desired, I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I supposed a motion was to be made for an executive session. I wish to move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Michigan yield, or does he yield the floor?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SHIVELY. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, before that is disposed of, I move, as a substitute, that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I second the motion. I do not believe the motion is debatable; but it is time we were getting through with this measure, sometime, somehow.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] moves an executive session, and that has precedence over a motion for a recess.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood that the Senator from Oklahoma had moved that we take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion for an executive session has precedence over a motion for a recess.

Mr. OWEN. I understood that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY] made his motion subject to the disposition of the previous motion.

Mr. SHIVELY. I did not. I said pending that motion I would move an executive session.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, a parliamentary question. I desire to give notice that if the motion of the Senator from Indiana is adopted I shall expect to proceed briefly with my remarks to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor and the Chair will recognize him to conclude his remarks when the bill comes up to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SHIVELY. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After nine minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. KERN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Solsberry and Newark, in the State of Indiana, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHIVELY, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15280) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, submitted a report (No. 586) thereon.

LABOR TROUBLES IN COLORADO.

Mr. OWEN. I introduce a joint resolution providing for the appointment of a commission to settle the labor disturbances in the State of Colorado, which I ask may be read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. THOMAS. I object, Mr. President, to the second reading and to the reference of the joint resolution. I ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will lie over.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $25,000 for an exhibit at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition of such articles, materials, and processes as may illustrate the progress of the Nation in the practice of hygiene and the art of sanitation, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANSDELL submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $12,000 for the purpose of constructing a new wharf at the New Orleans (La.) quarantine station, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RURAL CREDIT IN GERMANY.

Mr. JONES. I ask to have referred to the Committee on Printing for publication as a Senate document an address delivered by Ralph Metcalf, State senator and executive commissioner for the State of Washington of the American commission, before the Sixth Annual Convention of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, Division of Washington and Idaho, at Spokane, May 26, 1914. The address relates to agricultural problems of the United States and Europe, and so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

RECESS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 9, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 8, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. James F. Mackin, pastor of St. Paul's Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Our Father, the Father of all, of the Jew and the Gentile; our Father who art in heaven, which we hope will one day be our home, hallowed be Thy name. We pray Thee, O God of might, wisdom, and justice, through whom authority is rightly administered, laws are enacted, and judgment decreed, assist with Thy Holy Spirit of counsel and fortitude the Members of this Congress; let the light of Thy divine wisdom direct their deliberations and shine forth in all the proceedings and laws framed for our rule and government, so that they may tend to the preservation of peace, the promotion of national happiness, the increase of industry, sobriety, and useful knowledge, and may perpetuate to us the blessings of equal liberty; through Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, June 6, was read and approved.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday, June 9, the House stand in recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m.; that a session be held from 8 o'clock p. m. until 11 o'clock p. m. for the consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole of bills on the Private Calendar which are not objected to, commencing with No. 132 on said calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] asks unanimous consent that to-morrow at 5 o'clock p. m. the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.; that there shall be a night session, extending not later than 11 p. m., for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar which are not objected to in the House as in Committee of the Whole, to begin with No. 132 on the Private Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, why does the gentleman say 5 o'clock? If the House recesses at 6 o'clock until 8, it will be ample time for the Members to get their dinners.

Mr. POU. I thought 5 o'clock was about the usual time for recessing when we have an evening session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the House meet at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. POU. The gentleman in charge of the appropriation bill [Mr. FITZGERALD] suggests that the House meet at 11 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the double request—one, the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] just stated by the Speaker, and the other, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow a. m.? Is there objection to either request?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, will it not be practicable to have the Private Calendar considered during the daytime on some day a little later in the session?

Mr. POU. There are perhaps 75 bills on the Private Calendar which have never been considered by unanimous consent. My idea was that if we began at No. 132 we might finish the consideration of the Private Calendar by unanimous consent, and then later on there certainly ought to be one or two days given for the consideration of contested bills. I think we will scarcely finish the Private Calendar to-morrow night, in the manner in which we have been proceeding heretofore. I believe there is certainly more than three hours' work, and the pressure has been very great to have these bills considered in order to have an opportunity to pass upon bills which are not objected to. I think there are quite a number of bills on the calendar which will not be objected to.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman why he omits the first 10 or 11 bills on the Private Calendar?

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman that we have had two nights for the consideration of bills by unanimous consent, and we got down to No. 132. Now, I think it would be only fair to begin at No. 132. The bills preceding No. 132 have already had their opportunity for consideration. By beginning at No. 132 and continuing until the end of the calendar it will give all bills an opportunity to be considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. What I asked was whether it would not be practicable to have this done at a day session. Twelve hours a day at this session, with the weather the way it is to-day and the way it is prophesied for to-morrow, in addition to other work which Members have, is rather a long session of the House.

Mr. POU. I would be very glad to accept the suggestion, if the House would agree to give the committee a day instead of a night; but we have been displaced so many times that I have hesitated to ask for a day, because the Committee on Claims wishes to preserve its usual attitude of humility.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman might get a day after we finish the sundry civil bill.

Mr. MANN. As far as I am concerned, I should think the gentleman might get a day after the sundry civil bill is finished, not to interfere with the contested-election case.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think we ought to attempt to agree on a day that far in advance at this time. I see no reason in the world, if gentlemen want to come here to-morrow evening to consider the Private Calendar, why they should not do so. Considering bills by unanimous consent can not hurt anybody, because one man's objection will send a bill over; but I think if any class of bills are badly treated in this House, the small claims on the Private Calendar are badly treated. Such a bill has nobody as its friend and no opportunity to be heard. Many of these cases could be disposed of by unanimous consent, and I think the request of the gentleman from North Carolina is eminently fair and correct. I would be willing myself at this time to agree to a unanimous-consent order that should take effect after the disposition of the sundry civil bill, because there are other matters of great importance that ought to be considered, and it will probably be 10 days or 2 weeks before we finish the sundry civil bill. We can not tell what the pressure at that time may be.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who is very attentive to his duties, probably would not be here at the evening session. On the other hand, I would be here. It makes a rather long day. It seems to me that the House ought to be able to get an afternoon for the consideration of these bills, and I have no doubt will be able to do so a little later.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] agree that next Saturday may be devoted to the consideration of private claims?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not agree to anything which will delay the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. The passage of that bill is more important than anything else pending in the House. It ought to become a law before the 1st of July, and it can not if it is to give way to everything that comes up. It carries $107,000,000 for the conduct of the Government, beginning on the 1st of July, and gentlemen ought to realize its importance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the double request stated by the Chair? It seems that they ought to go together.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. IGOE, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. GOEKE, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. J. I. NOLAN, until June 20, on account of important business.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if we can not agree on time to close general debate on the bill.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I have promised two hours and a half of time for the minority, and the minority of the minority wants one hour in addition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, the gentleman has not promised that time; he means that he has had requests for it.

Mr. GILLETT. Gentlemen have asked me for that time, and I told them they might have it if the majority was reasonable, as I supposed it would be. We want two hours and three quarters besides one hour for the minority of the minority.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, how much time has already been occupied?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has occupied 1 hour and 21 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts 2 hours and 40 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts involves more time than we can possibly consent to. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day general debate be closed.

Mr. GILLETT. I can not agree to that. I do not know what time the House proposes to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. What was the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day general debate on the bill be closed, the time to-day to be divided equally between the two sides.

Mr. GILLETT. What time does the gentleman propose to adjourn?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Between 5 and 6 o'clock.

Mr. GILLETT. That would leave us only three hours, whereas we want four.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We can stay until 7 or 8, as far as I am concerned. I am willing to stay until general debate is closed.

Mr. MANN. This is a hot day and everybody will be exhausted early.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the speeches are attractive, Members will stay; and if they are not, I do not blame them for leaving.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day general debate on this bill shall be closed and the time to-day be equally divided.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from New York ought to be reasonable in allowing time for general debate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I only have requests for 45 minutes on this side, and I want a few minutes myself.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman give us four hours?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, that is too much.

Mr. MANN. Then take more time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to give the gentleman five hours if we sit long enough.

Mr. GILLETT. If you are only to use one hour on that side, that would give us sufficient time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. At the present outlook that seems to be about all that we shall want, but the longer we leave this matter open the more requests we will have.

Mr. MANN. I do not see why the gentleman from New York should not take his chances as well as to put them all on us.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am taking my chances.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman only takes one hour on that side that would give us 4 hours.

Mr. GARNER. It would if we ran until 6 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not make that arrangement, but I will try and accommodate the gentleman; otherwise, I will move to close debate.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the power to do that, but I do not think it will expedite the passage of the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am willing to sit to-day long enough to complete the general debate, and we can easily complete it if gentlemen will make the agreement.

Mr. GILLETT. If the gentleman will give us 4 hours we will agree.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is unreasonable to ask us for 4 hours when that side has had double the time that we have used. I can not tell what indiscriminate Munchausen statements may be made in the general debate on that side of the House, and it may require some statements of fact on this side or the public will get confused. [Laughter.]

Mr. GILLETT. I rather think it will; but it seems to me that on a bill like this, carrying $107,000,000, 4 hours more of general debate is not an unreasonable amount of time, when we have not had any lately.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The House has been talking for three weeks.

Mr. GILLETT. Not in general debate; we are not going to talk on the trust bill.

Mr. MANN. Here is the most important appropriation bill of the session. It has always been customary to give a reasonable amount of general debate on it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is reasonable—two days on the bill at this stage of the session. There are a number of items in the bill which will require some debate.

Mr. MANN. I do not think we have made any unreasonable request for time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the committee rise to-day the general debate on the bill be concluded.

Mr. MANN. I warn the gentleman from New York that that will not expedite the passage of this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am ready to make any reasonable agreement.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I wish to ask what is the parliamentary situation?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, and, pending that, asked that when the committee rose finally to-day the general debate be closed.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Is not this District day?

The SPEAKER. It is District day, but it takes only a majority to dislocate District day.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. If I may be permitted, I would like to state the reason for my inquiry. There is a bill on the calendar reported out by the District Committee introduced by me that provides for safeguards for the workmen in the building industry and construction work. There was a man killed on the construction of a building within sight of this Capitol in the past week, and if this measure had been a law his life would have been saved. About 8 or 10 people in that industry each year lose their lives because a proper safeguard is not thrown around it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this discussion is not in order. We are trying to get started on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I wanted to state my reasons for thinking that this bill I speak of is so important that it should be given at least one hour of the House's time, in order that it might be passed, in spite of the opinion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

The SPEAKER. The situation is this: This is District day, but the rule also provides that after the reading of the Journal, it shall always be in order for the chairman or anyone else to make a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills, and the gentleman from New York is acting entirely within his rights, and is also within his rights when he makes this motion that when the committee rise finally to-day that general debate shall be ended.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman from Illinois desires to get at his bill, he can do so by voting down the motion of the gentleman from New York, can he not?

The SPEAKER. Of course he can.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be six hours of general debate, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to have four hours, which includes the allies, and this side to have two hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that there shall be not to exceed six hours of general debate upon this bill, four hours to go to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] and two hours to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. If we grant unanimous consent, would that prevent us from voting with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] against doing away with District day?

The SPEAKER. No. The gentleman can vote with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] if he desires to, on the motion to go into the committee.

Mr. BRYAN. We want to take up the Crosser bill for the Government ownership of the street-car lines in the District.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman can vote down the motion of the gentleman from New York. The Chair hears no objection to the gentleman's request. The gentleman from New York withdraws his motion to close general debate, and the question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky) there were—yeas 101, noes 22.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and there were—yeas 203, nays 65, answered "present" 4, not voting 161, as follows:

The name of Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. TAYLOR, and I desire to answer "present."

The name of Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. SLOAN, and I wish to withdraw my vote of "aye" and be recorded as answering "present."

The name of Mr. CLINE was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in control of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just in passing and as an illustration of practical methods of legislation of my Progressive friends, we just had a vote on going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil bill. Various gentlemen voted "no" for various reasons, but my Progressive friends voted "no" because they said they wanted to consider the Crosser bill, providing for Government ownership of public utilities. That was a strange reason for voting "no," considering the Crosser bill is not before the House, has not been reported to the House, and could not be considered by the House at this time—but it illustrates the intelligent manner in which some gentlemen would legislate.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BRYAN. I was the Member who told the gentleman I voted——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman told it publicly.

Mr. BRYAN. I said I voted for that reason, as I did. The gentleman will realize that the Crosser bill will be before the House to-morrow morning, and in view of the fact that they have announced that the reason why the Committee of the Whole House can not consider it is that other District business——

Mr. MANN. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. BRYAN. But the gentleman yielded for a question, and I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is making an unfortunate speech. Does the gentleman claim that the Crosser bill is before the House or could be now considered?

Mr. BRYAN. I claim if we take up the matter of District business it will expedite the Crosser bill; and anybody who has the intelligence of the gentleman from Illinois knows that if we take up and dispose of District business to-day that will tend to expedite the Crosser bill.

Mr. MANN. Anybody who has any intelligence—not my intelligence, but anybody who has any intelligence in a parliamentary sense—knows that you can not consider a bill in the House which is not pending before the House and has not been reported to the House.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman will admit——

Mr. MANN. I would not admit anything of the kind.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, it is a fact, just the same. The gentleman does not admit the truth; that is what is the matter with him.

Mr. MANN. This would be District day, and what is done to-day has nothing to do with what would be done to-morrow under the rules of the House; and the gentleman from Washington, pretending to have some intelligent perception of legislation, voted against the consideration of a great appropriation bill to-day because he thought that he wanted to consider a bill which would not be considered under any circumstances to-day; and if the gentleman from Washington knew anything about the status of business in the House, he would not have given such a weak and silly excuse.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. Chairman, on Saturday my colleague from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], in discussing the beef situation and the placing of meats on the free list, referred to beef of Argentina, and among other erroneous statements which he made I quote:

> Argentina for many years has been importing the best breeding cattle the broken-down dray horses they kill in Kansas City and manufacture into wienerwurst can compete with our corn-fed beeves. The Argentine beeves are grass-fed cattle.

And again:

> Nearly all the cattle in the Argentine Republic are afflicted with the foot-and-mouth disease, and there is not any country in the world, as I understand it, which permits the importation of live cattle from the Argentine Republic. Talk about cattle with the foot-and-mouth disease competing with our corn-fed beef in the West!

And so forth.

Of course, those statements enamanting from the fanciful imagination of my colleague, who dwells in vivid imagination, pass without necessary contradiction, and yet in view of the fact that the Democratic administration of the Agricultural Department just issued the Agricultural Yearbook within the last few days, and they have an article on this subject by one of the officials of the present administration, it is perhaps proper to call the attention of the House to a few of the things which actually do exist. My colleague suggests that the Argentine beef is like the dray horses. I notice in the Agricultural Yearbook, opposite page 353, the picture of a Shorthorn bull sold at the Palermo stock show, Argentina, for $35,000 gold. I suppose, of course, that is a dray-horse bull. I do not recall when any bull raised in the district of my agricultural friend from Illinois sold for $35,000. But I suppose that these fine bulls which they have in Argentina will be considered as akin to the dray horses in the district of my colleague.

And you will find opposite page 352 the picture of young cattle on a typical ranch in the alfalfa regions.

Mr. BORCHERS. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I do not. I ask the gentleman to follow me closely, and follow the yearbook, and he will learn a great deal that he does not know now. This is a picture of a herd of young cattle on a typical ranch in the alfalfa region of Argentina, and I doubt very much whether in the district of my colleague they can produce a herd of young cattle of finer looks, or of finer beef, or which will even make a finer picture.

Here is the report of an investigation made by the Department of Agriculture by the direction of the Democratic Secretary of Agriculture—and I apologize for saying "the Democratic Secretary of Agriculture," because I do not think there is any politics in that department—where the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry has made a report to the effect that this meat is of the highest quality, that the herds are of the best kind, that the feed is of the best quality, and that the meat is thoroughly and well inspected where it is killed, before it leaves the country.

My colleague, dwelling in the times of old, probably remembers when Texas cattle were supposed to have horns 3 or 4 yards long between the extreme points, and he has an imagination that that still exists in Argentina. But as the cattle of this country have been improved, so the cattle of Argentina have been improved. Here is a portion of this report, on page 358:

> Argentina for many years has been importing the best breeding cattle and sheep from Great Britain, and to-day has some of the finest types in the world.

And the gentleman will find, opposite page 360, some more pictures of Hereford and Shorthorn bulls which it would be hard to meet in quality in the district of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. That is not all. This administration of the War Department, claiming that it wished to supply meat of good quality to the army at Vera Cruz, recently attempted to purchase a cargo of beef controlled in part by the beef packers and shippers of this country for the purpose of diverting the cargo to Vera Cruz. And I am wondering whether it is the policy of the present administration to furnish the meat of dray horses to our boys at the front. [Applause on the Republican side.] Either the gentleman, my colleague from Illinois, owes an apology to Argentina or else the War Department owes an apology to the soldier boys at Vera Cruz and to the people of the United States.

And yet, Mr. Chairman, it is on stuff like this, without any facts and dealing wholly in fancy, that that side of the House expects—no; I will not say expects, because they do not expect, but they propose to make a fight for the next House without any expectation of winning it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, the argument I made with reference to Argentine beef last Saturday is that it is a grass-fed beef. The cattle are fattened upon grass and not upon corn. I have not read the yearbook, which has just made its appearance there, or any other publication recently issued on the subject, but I know that in the Argentine Republic their method of beef feeding and method of conducting their various branches of animal husbandry is to increase the area of their alfalfa-producing lands and feed upon alfalfa. And I will undertake to say that no grass-fed animals fattened upon grass anywhere in this world can compare with the corn-fattened beeves of the corn belt of this country. They may be better than some of the animals they manufacture into weinerwurst in Kansas City, but they can not compare with corn-fed beeves, no matter how much the Beef Trust would like to make the country believe they can in order to force down the price of our beef animals. I have not the facts with reference to supplying the army down there at Vera Cruz with Argentine beef, but if they have attempted to supply under this administration our soldiers and sailors in Vera Cruz with Argentine beef, they are doing better than the Republican administration did when our soldiers and sailors were on the great island to the south of us and they fed them with the potted beef the Republican Party was able to obtain in the city of Chicago. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Argentine beef may not be as good as our corn-fed cattle, but if we feed our men with Argentine beef we have not fed them with the kind of rotten potted meats sent down by the Republican administration to Cuba and fed to our soldier boys there in the Spanish-American War. All of it was manufactured in Chicago by the very gentlemen he champions upon this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I remember that the leader of the Progressive Party in this country to-day, and President of the United States for seven years, a Republican President, when holding a high command on the Island of Cuba, headed a round robin addressed to the generals in command there, protesting against the kind of "embalmed beef" the friends of the leader on the Republican side were furnishing our soldiers there on the Island of Cuba. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, I am speaking for the corn-belt farmers. I do not know these beef barons in Chicago. I am not speaking for them, but the gentleman last Saturday admitted that he knew them well and personally, and that he had discussed with them the question of Argentine beef, and they told him it was all right. And so he becomes their advertising agent upon this floor in opposition to the farmers of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A few million dollars in gold held up in front of him will hypnotize any Republican leader.

I saw a subject of a mesmerist once at a public exhibition given a piece of an old leather boot, and he was told by the mesmerist that it was the finest kind of beefsteak; and he did the best he could to eat it, but he was mesmerized. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It was psychological beef. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. RAINEY. It produced that psychological effect upon his mind. [Laughter.]

Now, millions of money and the influence of the Armours in Chicago and their money reach out through the section of the State——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. Reach out through the section of Chicago represented by my colleague from Illinois. The millions that they hold there in front of his eyes have mesmerized him—have hypnotized him—until he appears here as the advertising agent in the country for the kind of stuff they furnished our soldiers down in Cuba in opposition to the farmers of the corn belt in the Middle West; and there are other gentlemen on that side who seem to have been hypnotized and mesmerized in the same kind of a way. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague made statements Saturday which I have refuted by the testimony of his own administration, and then he takes the floor, and does he answer my statements? No; he dodges. He may be termed an "artful dodger." Having made statements that he had no basis to believe, he then makes other statements of similar character.

I do not know whether my colleague is familiar with alfalfa or not. He claims to be a farmer, and I believe he owns a farm and supports it by his salary received here. [Laughter.] But if he has acquaintance with alfalfa, he knows that there is no better feed than alfalfa. I quote again from the report of the Department of Agriculture:

> Nearly all of the cattle slaughtered in the frigorificos are either raised upon alfalfa pastures or are brought in from native-grass pastures and finished on alfalfa. These cattle as a rule are highly bred, the principal breeds being the Durham (shorthorn), Hereford, and the Polled Angus, ranking numerically in the order named.

My colleague, having uttered a libel which he ought to have known was utterly untrue on Saturday, now attempts to dodge that by talking about furnishing poor beef at the time of the Cuban War, and with an ignorance which is not surprising, considering its source, refers to the "round robin" with which Col. Roosevelt was connected as being in conjunction with the matter of beef supply. A man ought to have intelligence enough and memory enough before he refers to facts of this kind to know what they were. The "round robin" had nothing to do with that subject, but my colleague is as near to the truth there as he usually gets with his vivid imagination.

Mr. Chairman, I do not represent the packing houses. I am not advertising the packing houses. I am seeking to refute a scandalous charge, wholly without foundation, which my colleague made on Saturday for the purpose of deluding the farmers to favor a tariff bill which he assisted in putting through, putting meat on the free list. And now he is trying to fool the farmers. The farmers are not fooled. They have noted what these gentlemen have done in reference to the tariff, as you will discover in November. But now, having been caught with the goods on him, in reference to the effect of the tariff, my colleague seeks by innuendo and statements without foundation, to make out that there is no competition between American beef and Argentine beef. There is an active competition, and the men who favor the Beef Trust are the men who put meat on the free list, so that the Armours and Swifts, who own these slaughterhouses in Argentina, can bring the meat into the United States free of duty.

I am on the side of the farmer. My colleague has legislated in favor of the Beef Trust, and, without manhood enough to acknowledge it, tries to make statements without any foundation. The Beef Trust, through their houses in Argentina, are in active competition, both in the United States and abroad, with American beef, bringing beef from Argentina.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I think there ought to be a duty on that beef in the interest of the farmer, and there will be when we get a chance to legislate. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, adopting his characteristic methods on this floor, my colleague, with the ill humor which always characteristizes him in debate, charges me with lack of manhood in the speech I made on Saturday; charges me with uttering a libel in that speech. What I said in reference to Argentine beef was that it was fattened upon alfalfa. What he proved in his speech this morning was that it was fattened upon grasses and only finished upon alfalfa. He proved everything I said and more. That is the libel I uttered. That is the lack of manhood I have exhibited, according to the explanation of the gentleman from Illinois.

The gentleman from Illinois has a perpetual grouch in this House. I never knew him to be pleased with anything here or anywhere else in my life, except Argentine beef, imported by the cattle barons of his own city. I do not care what the breeding of cattle is. I know that if they are fattened upon grasses they are not as good as, and can not be compared with, cattle that are fattened upon corn; and everybody knows that except the gentleman from Illinois.

Now, I remember what the conditions were in Cuba. The gentleman criticizes us in his speech because we were furnishing the Army down there with Argentine beef which, according to his standard, he says is as good as ours. I called attention to the embalmed beef provided by the gentleman's administration to our soldiers in the island of Cuba, manufactured by his constituents in Chicago; and there are soldiers of the Spanish-American War on this floor—one of them right in front of me—who know about it, and who were there on that island and ate or tried to eat that embalmed beef, and there are thousands of them throughout the country to-day. The "round robin" was a protest against all of the conditions on the island of Cuba, made possible by a Republican administration of affairs here and maladministration of the Army there on that island. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Afterwards, when the matter was investigated by a committee of Congress, they found that the beef was all right. A Republican committee found it was all right. I myself talked with the buyer for Armour—a man who was employed on a salary—at that time, and I said, "Do you think they are going to approve this embalmed beef of yours down there in Cuba?" He said, "They have got to approve it. The administration has said it is all right. They have denied these complaints. We are safe. We will get our money." And they did. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 24 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as a Representative of an alfalfa-producing region, I can not allow the opportunity to pass to attempt to enlighten the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] relative to the meat-producing qualities of that great and splendid grass product. Alfalfa beef is as much better than corn-fed beef in richness and juiciness as corn-fed beef is better than the dray-horse meat that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] referred to. I was struck by some of the inconsistencies of the gentleman's references to the matter of the importation of beef. He spent an hour on Saturday laboriously trying to prove that the free importation of corn had not reduced and never would reduce the price of corn. That speech was made for circulation in the corn belt. It will have no place in the Democratic campaign literature circulated east of the Allegheny Mountains. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Ascalon, lest those whom you have promised that free trade in agricultural products would bring lower prices and lower cost of living will learn that you are now trying to prove that these tariff changes will have no such effect.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] says that Argentine beef can never find a considerable market here because the cattle are of the dray-horse variety, and that they all have the foot and mouth disease. I suppose that is the kind of beef the Democratic Party intended to give the people when they put beef on the free list. The American consumer under Republican times could eat good American beef, but in Democratic times he needs, or, at least, our Democratic friends offer him under free trade, dray-horse beef and beef infected with the foot-and-mouth disease. If Argentine beef is infected with the foot-and-mouth disease to such an extent that no civilized country will allow it to be imported on the hoof, as I understood the gentleman to say, in God's name why is this Democratic administration allowing it to be killed and the meat shipped into our market without the inspection that is required of our beef products?

On Saturday, in connection with the sundry civil bill, I took occasion to refer to some matters illustrating the condition of the Treasury and our foreign trade. I called attention to the fact that the generous balance left in the Treasury at the close of a Republican administration had been dissipated and reduced by one-half in 15 months of Democratic administration. I called attention to the fact that at the rate at which expenditures were outrunning receipts a bond issue for the purpose of securing revenue was inevitable, and at the best could scarcely be postponed much beyond the coming elections.

I also called attention to the progressively unsatisfactory and lamentable condition of our foreign trade, illustrating that disastrous condition by the foreign commerce reports for the month of April last as compared with April a year ago. I pointed out the fact that while we had imported more than $27,000,000 worth of goods in April, 1914, more than we had imported in April, 1913, our sales abroad in the April just past of goods, wares, and merchandise were $37,000,000 less than our sales abroad in April a year ago. In April, 1913, the balance of trade in our favor amounted to over $50,000,000. During the April last past the balance of trade against us amounted to nearly $15,000,000. In other words, there was an adverse shifting of trade for the month of April, 1914, compared with April, 1913, of nearly $65,000,000, or, to be entirely accurate, $64,968,418.

Gentlemen on the other side can not fail to be impressed by trade conditions such as these. Even the reckless optimism of a free-trade Democrat is not altogether proof against the startling conditions of trade which these figures indicate.

But one does not need to study figures of exports and imports to learn of the alarming condition of the country industrially. Go where you will and you hear the same story of stagnation and depression; of industries closed, running on short time, or operating without profit in the hope of better conditions later. In short, we have come upon the conditions which are proverbial under Democratic policies, with every indication of worse conditions ahead. Increasing imports of foreign goods, depriving the American producer of his market at home, coupled with decreasing sales abroad, warns us that bad as is our present situation conditions are certain to become more unfavorable as time passes.

Where are the markets abroad which were promised and the lower cost of living at home which was prophesied. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], interrupting me on Saturday, took the position, as I understood him, that with a decrease of exports and an increase of importation articles must of necessity be cheaper; but facts are stubborn things, and whatever ones theory may be the fact is conceded by all intelligent observers that the cost of living has increased rather than decreased since the passage of the Underwood bill. In fact, our Democratic colleagues from the country districts are themselves making that claim as regards foodstuffs.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR] at the close of my speech on Saturday injected into the RECORD a statement that 9 out of 11 agricultural products were higher now than they were when the Underwood bill passed. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] labored for an hour to prove that corn was not lower, and that it would not be lower by reason of free trade in that article. In other words, our Democratic friends are now endeavoring to make a virtue of the fact or the claim that their prophecies have not been fulfilled. They promised the consumers of the country cheaper living and lower prices, and to accomplish it they opened the gates and allowed to come in the weevil-eaten corn of Argentina, as it is described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], and the foot-and-mouth diseased beef of Argentina, as it is described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. They let it in for the purpose of making living cheaper, and now the only claim they can make, in the face of the unfortunate conditions which exist throughout the country, is that they were mistaken, and that the cost of living has not been reduced, but so far as agricultural products are concerned has been increased. Those are arguments, of course, for the corn belt and the country districts, and they will not be circulated along the Atlantic seaboard where dwell the people out of employment who were promised good wages, steady work, and cheaper living.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] seemed on Saturday exceedingly proud of the fact that the price of wool, pressed down to a point below the value of foreign wool of the same quality under the Democratic threat of free trade, had, to a very limited extent, risen from that extremely low price and is now somewhat higher than a year ago. He makes a virtue, in the matter of wool, of the fact that their prophecies that free wool would make wool cheaper for the consumer had not been fulfilled.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I am not asking the gentleman to yield. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] makes the point that there is no quorum present. There are 58 Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and 245 Members answered to their names, and that he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming has 13 minutes remaining.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted with the roll call I was alluding to the present unfortunate conditions of domestic business and foreign trade. Our democratic friends, no longer able to deny the deplorable industrial conditions of the country, no longer able to blink the fact that the industries of the country are paralyzed, running on short time, without profit, or closing down entirely, are attempting to explain it on the theory that these conditions are psychological. No longer able to deny that our foreign trade is in a condition which, if it continues for 12 months longer, will bankrupt the Treasury and bring an industrial panic, no longer able to deny these facts, the gentlemen from the bucolic districts of the Mississippi Valley are laying the flattering unction to their souls that they can be reelected by saying, "Well, at any rate, the promises we made that the cost of living was going to be reduced has not been fulfilled any better than the balance of the promises we made; things have gone up when we said they would go down. The fact is that the cost of living has actually increased under the Underwood bill." That may go all right in Indiana and Ohio and some of the back districts of Illinois, but I doubt it. The American farmer understands that, whatever may be the immediate effect, free trade in his products is bound in the long run to injure him; the American wool grower knows that the threat of free trade in wool always sends American wool to a price below the foreign price and that thereafter there is a slight temporary reaction. He knows that he is now receiving about 5 cents a pound less for his wool, compared with the price of like foreign wool, than he received under the Republican protective tariff.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not. The farmer also knows—and if he does not there will be plenty to remind him when you get ready to issue bonds—that we have lost about $15,000,000 in revenue through increased importations of wool duty free. The American farmer also knows that no one has benefited by free wool except some manufacturers.

So much for the conditions at home confronting our Democratic friends. What do we find when we look abroad? A foreign policy that no man under the flag honestly defends; leastwise I have not been able to find anyone who did not openly or under his breath condemn it or apologize for it. A foreign policy based wholly on the President's determination to have his personal way in an international matter. Our entire foreign policy can be summed up in these words, "Huerta must go." To carry out that declaration the administration made friends with every enemy of order in Mexico. We aided, encouraged, and abetted all of the outlaws and bandits in the Republic to the south of us. In order that the President may have his way he opened our ports to the shipment of arms, and thus spread and extended the theater of rapine and desolation. To eliminate Huerta we have become responsible for the bloody scenes of Torreon and Gomez Palacio. We became largely responsible for the cold-blooded murder of defenseless unarmed men, prisoners of war, by our allies under Villa at Paredon, Saltillo, and Tepic.

In order that Huerta might be eliminated our boats sailed away from Tampico, and left 2,000 of our people at the mercy of a howling mob. To drive out Huerta we sacrificed the lives of our brave marines at Vera Cruz; in order that Huerta may be driven from power we are breaking our faith with the mediators who have met at Niagara Falls, by virtually acting as convoy for vessels carrying arms to the so-called constitutionalists. In order that the President might have his way in Mexico we are about to surrender our sovereign rights in the canal we have builded to unite the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific. And that is our situation abroad.

Oh, you gentlemen on the other side realize the situation at last. You can fight against facts for a time, but ultimately they conquer you. You may attempt to govern this country and care for it and its citizens upon your theoretical lines, under your policies that have proven disastrous when they were tried, but ultimately the day of reckoning must come, and it is coming, coming very soon.

You have had your Belshazzar's feast of Democratic policies, legislative and administrative, and now you sit blanched with fear, knowing that the day of reckoning is not far off. The finger of time is writing upon the wall of passing events the fatal words written in the court of the king of Babylon: "Ye have been weighed in the balance and found wanting." It will require no Daniel to interpret the writing. The American people understand full well its true meaning, and in November they will repudiate you and all your works and doctrines and return a majority on this side of the House. [Applause on the Republican side.] I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BEAKES].

Mr. BEAKES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an article from the Louisville Times of June 5, 1914, in relation to the woolen-mill industry, and also an article from a Portland, Oreg., paper regarding the woolen industry of that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, it has been an almost daily occurrence during the past several months for some Republican Member of this body to deliver a speech wherein the industries of our country are pictured as wrecked and ruined as a result of an honest effort on the part of the Democratic Party to comply with the mandate of the people to revise the tariff downward.

The distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has carried the leading rôle in the calamity chorus. He has just had the floor for almost half an hour for the purpose of repeating his indictment of the Democratic Party and the Underwood tariff law, and I might say in passing that this same gentleman occupied the floor of this House for a considerable length of time on last Saturday repeating in substance what he said to-day, and has said on various other occasions in this House.

In order to be fair to the gentleman from Wyoming and to the other Members of the minority party, I should state that in this work of attempting to create distrust and to destroy confidence in the business world the gentleman from Wyoming has been ably assisted by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. These valiant representatives of special privilege have been working overtime in their efforts to give to the public the impression that no matter what the actual conditions of the industrial and business world may be, the country will and must go to wreck because of the dreadful mistake the people made in November, 1912, in turning the Republican Party out of power.

We have heard from these distinguished gentlemen about the Argentine corn, the Argentine beef, the Australian wool, the Australian butter, the Chinese eggs, and I believe the Japanese cheese, that under the new tariff rates were sure to put the American farmer out of business, so often that it would overtax one's memory to recall the number of times. The fact of the matter is, these gentlemen have repeated their calamity stories regarding the American farmer so many times that they have come to believe in the truthfulness of their own statements, and continue to repeat them, notwithstanding the fact that market reports show that the American farmer is doing fairly well, notwithstanding the panic-producing efforts of the calamity howlers.

The gentleman from Wyoming has been particularly brilliant in his prophecies as to the fate of the sheep industry of this country because of the fact that wool was put on the free list in the Underwood bill. From the very beginning of the movement to reduce the tariff this gentlemen has been firmly convinced that free wool meant the ruination of the sheep industry. Yet the fact is and the gentleman from Wyoming knew, or ought to have known, that the wool industry of this country had all but perished under the high protection of the Republican tariff measures; he knew or ought to have known that during the decade from 1900 to 1910, when the Republicans were in power and wool was highly protected, that the number of sheep in this country decreased 13,000,000 head.

But such knowledge did not prevent this distinguished advocate of high protection and of Cannonism and prophet of industrial ruin from denouncing the Underwood bill and terrifying the woolgrowers of our country into the belief that their industry was ruined.

Instead of the sheep industry being ruined, that industry has been made more profitable as a result of putting wool on the free list.

Wool is bringing a higher price to-day than at any time since 1897, and a great many woolgrowers, particularly in the West, who contracted their year's clipping early at a low rate because of the prophecies of the calamity howlers of the Republican Party are to-day mourning the loss of several cents a pound on their 1914 wool clip.

I venture the statement, Mr. Chairman, that when the gentleman from Wyoming appears before his constituents this fall asking for reelection to Congress, the woolgrowers of his district, who have suffered a loss of several cents a pound on their wool clip because of the gentleman's terrifying speeches prophesying a ruined sheep industry as a result of free wool, will have some embarrassing and pointed questions to propound to the star prophet of industrial ruin.

Mr. Chairman, we have not only been told time and again by the leaders of the Republican Party on the floor of this House that the American farmer was going to be ruined by the tariff reductions of the Underwood law, but we have also been told that the manufacturers of the country were going to be put out of business.

The common and oft-repeated statement has been that the tariff rates of the Underwood bill have closed factories, annihilated profits, and all but ruined the manufacturing interests of our country, and in the very next breath we have been told that prices have not come down at all.

Of course, the advocates of special privileges, in their zeal to make a case never stopped to think that if prices have not come down the manufacturers ought not to complain. If prices have not fallen, the manufacturers must be getting the same prices for their goods now that they received before the passage of the Underwood tariff bill, and consequently there should be no occasion for closing their factories.

Mr. Chairman, it seems that all Republicans have not the same view regarding the Underwood tariff bill and its effects on the industries of this country. Most of the prophecies of disaster that we have heard on this floor have come from the ranks of the old guard of the Republican Party.

The members of the Progressive Party and what might be called the progressive element of the Republican Party have been content to await developments and to allow the Underwood tariff bill to have a chance to demonstrate the wisdom of its enactment before attempting to indulge in criticisms, real or imaginary.

Not only are the Republicans in this House divided on the question of the merits of the Underwood tariff bill and its effect on industry in general, but it would appear also that a great many of the leading Republican papers of the country take an entirely different view of the present industrial situation, as resulting from the Underwood tariff law, than the pessimistic views expressed and reexpressed and expressed again and again by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and his associates in the work of creating a panic.

I received this morning a copy of the Oshkosh Northwestern, a Republican newspaper published in my district, containing an editorial bearing on the present industrial situation.

The editorial is under date of June 6, 1914, and it reads as follows:

THE TARIFF AND WOOL PRICES.

When the tariff on raw wool was reduced western sheep growers joined in the prediction that the change would speedily ruin their business. This was last year, and as the western sheepmen are now engaged in shearing and marketing another "clip" it is of interest to note to what extent their dire predictions of last summer are being verified.

A special dispatch from Great Falls, Mont., to the Minneapolis Journal quotes Joseph Strong, a veteran wool dealer, who has been in business for 25 years in that State, as saying the Montana wool crop this year will probably reach 26,000,000 pounds, and that there is very active competition for such portion of it as still is unsold, with prices ranging from 18 to 20 cents per pound for the standard grades. This is several cents better than the average price received for the wool clip of last year and also several cents more than the bulk of this year's crop was actually sold for. In other words, it appears that the woolmen were needlessly apprehensive of the effect of the lowered tariff, and early in the season they "contracted" most of their clip around 15 and 16 cents. Now they are sorry they did so, for their neighbors who held off are getting much better prices and they realize their own groundless fears have cost them a considerable amount, which alone would represent a handsome profit.

This appears to be typical of the situation which prevails in many lines of business at the present time. There has been much talk and many predictions of the "injurious effects" of the new tariff and a general tendency on the part of manufacturers and others to slow down and hold back in anticipation of seeing these predictions verified. This very tendency has had an adverse effect on trade and business and probably has done more real harm than any direct result of tariff changes. The new tariff may not be perfect, it is true, and in fact a perfect tariff is beyond the range of hope or possibility. It will be noted, however, that few, if any, specific instances are being cited where the new tariff is proving destructive or even seriously damaging to American industry. It is the fear of the thing that is causing the trouble, and in most instances this fear is quite groundless, as has been shown in the case of the western woolgrowers.

In the wool manufacturing industry, the same as with the woolgrowers, it is now conceded that the tariff, instead of proving destructive, is having very little effect on conditions. The American woolen mills are having all they can do, there has been no reduction in profits or dividends, and with assurance of continued prosperity there have been several notable extensions and enlargements of the business.

This editorial strikes an entirely different note as regards the present industrial situation than the note usually struck by those who have taken upon themselves the task of creating distrust and destroying confidence in the business world simply because in the writing of the Underwood bill the tariff barons were not permitted to have their way.

I fear that some of my colleagues will think the Oshkosh Northwestern must be a Democratic paper, inasmuch as its editorial takes a position directly the opposite of what we have been hearing on the floor of this House from the leaders of the Republican Party.

The Oshkosh Northwestern is not only a Republican paper, but it is owned and edited by one of the distinguished Republicans of Wisconsin, a man who has long been identified with the Republican Party and who has been honored with high office by that party.

This paper has the largest circulation, I believe, of any paper, Democratic or Republican, in the State of Wisconsin outside the city of Milwaukee. It is published and has a large circulation in a district known as the Fox River Valley, a veritable beehive of industry and one of the most highly developed agricultural sections of the whole country.

It is a pleasure, indeed, to note that there are not a few Republican editors who are unwilling to join the chorus of calamity howlers in their attempt to create distrust in the industrial world and thereby bring about a panic in order that their party might reap some political benefit.

This editorial speaks of the industrial conditions as they are. The calamity howlers within and without this House have drawn upon their imaginations for the purpose of picturing industrial conditions as their exploded theories would have them be.

The editor and owner of this paper is an able and honest leader of public opinion, caring more for the truth than he does for party advantage.

If the representatives of the Republican element of the business world and the Republican press had joined forces with the calamity howlers in and out of Congress in an attempt to destroy confidence and instill fear in the business world, there can be no doubt at all but that we would have had a panic long ago.

If we do not have a panic and if we are able to go through the process of reorganizing our industrial system on just and equitable lines without any severe industrial depression, the success of the process will not be due to any patriotic impulse that animated the leaders of the Republican Party on the other side of this Chamber, but rather to the patriotism of many leaders of the industrial world and to the patriotism of a respectable element of the Republican press, all of whom cheerfully put the welfare of country above the welfare of party.

I commend to the careful consideration of my distinguished colleagues on the other side of this House who have been engaged so industriously for the past few months in waving the flag of industrial distress the following quotation from the editorial herein referred to:

> The new tariff may not be perfect, it is true, and in fact a perfect tariff is beyond the range of hope or possibility. It will be noted, however, that few, if any, specific instances are being cited where the new tariff is proving destructive or even seriously damaging to American industry.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say, to start with, that I have been very much impressed with the character of the discussion here this morning. The continuous vaudeville between our two distinguished friends from Illinois, followed by the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming, who found it necessary to redeliver the speech he made on Saturday for fear the country would not fully appreciate the extent to which he has gone in drawing upon his imagination, makes it somewhat embarrassing for me to discuss the proposition that I have in mind. And inasmuch as the gentleman referred to the Representatives of Indiana as some of the men who are attempting to fool the farmer back West this year on the wool question, I want briefly to say that the people of Indiana, in its whole 13 congressional districts, are a very intelligent class of people; they need no gratuitous advice from the gentleman from Wyoming. In the district which I have the honor to represent the farmers are building a woolen mill at the present time through a subscription of $100,000 of stock. They do not entertain the fears that the gentleman from Wyoming pretends that he does. I do not want it understood that I am accusing the gentleman from Wyoming of misrepresenting the facts, but I want to say that it is the most marvelous exhibition of economy of truth that I have witnessed in a long time. No man in this House but knows that the trend of the market on wool has absolutely impeached every declaration made by advocates of the woolen doctrine from a high protection standpoint last year. Wool is bringing more to-day than it has brought in the last 10 years at this season of the year in the open market. Wool is bringing more in Wyoming to-day than it has brought in 7 years, and the statistics are available to show that fact. The people of this country are to have an opportunity to buy and wear real woolen goods and escape the shoddy that a protective tariff fraudulently shelters. I want to discuss very briefly in the few minutes that I have some of the conditions that have produced the economic social situation that exists to-day.

Mr. Chairman, the Congress of the United States is to be congratulated that it has set its face for the solution of great economic problems that confront it with a purpose to solve them and solve them correctly. The efforts of the last 10 days can not be without favor in every line of enterprise. With men of all parties no greater exhibition of patriotism for the public weal has been shown during my service here. Stripped of every selfish purpose, men regardless of party or section vie with each other in their determination to write into law those conditions that shall evolve out of the great social fabric of American democracy a great equality and justice for all. In this wonderful sweep of the new adjustment of business we have all had a part. Speaking from a party standpoint, the transition period has been the most wonderful of any period of our political history. No party was ever subjected to a severer test to maintain its popular favor or to safely guard the interests of all classes of business than ours has been. In no other period has any party reduced the rates of duty on imports without seriously disturbing business conditions; at no period heretofore have we concurrently reduced the rate of duty on imports and changed our whole fiscal system. The Democratic Party made the changes because the people demanded that they should be made, and because we promised to make them if intrusted to power. You know why there has been no serious interruption to business; why in the million avenues of trade throughout our diversified industries there was no unnatural depression. It is because the people have confidence in the business ability, capacity, and patriotism of the Democratic Party. It is worth while to remark that no charge has been made against us in the recent tariff legislation that we discriminated between citizens. No charge has been made against us that we make the Government an instrument in the hands of special interests to promote their own private well-being. No charge is made against the Democratic Party that in currency legislation we permitted great financial interests, heretofore all controlling, to prescribe the character or the methods of the administration of the currency measure. The Democratic Party is commended everywhere and by all classes of citizens for its efforts to legislate in the interests of all the people and not to the prejudice of any class of people.

But how do these problems happen to confront us now? How does it occur that the reduction of the tariff, the introduction of a new currency system into our fiscal affairs is necessary; the regulation of corporations, the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the enactment of trust legislation, the conservation of the natural resources—all intricate, complex, and embarrassing—how does it occur that they come to us now for solution? What is there in the trend of events that forced upon us these serious questions that reach down to the very roots of our national life, that should make it necessary, in the interests of the people, that they be settled now? Let me refresh your recollections of a few historical facts. For more than 75 years of our history we were engaged in settling political problems, not social or economic problems. We amended, defined, and interpreted the Constitution; we blocked out great States in the empire of the unimproved lands of the West; we fought for 50 years over the doctrine of State rights and nullification, until we were compelled to settle those questions by the bloodiest and most devastating war in human history. Having done that, every citizen turned to the development of our boundless resources. On every side were beckoning hands inviting the genius, the thrift, the energy of all the people to rehabilitate the Nation and turn its feet into the highway leading to the achievement it now enjoys.

The liberties and privileges of the individual citizen were larger, freer, and more unrestrained at that time than in any other period in our national growth. For more than a quarter of a century following the war the life of the individual citizen was one of individualism in trade, in manufacture, and commerce. It is within the memory of many whom I now address that your neighbors in every line of manufacture contributed to your wants. The wagon maker, the shoemaker, the little local woolen mill, ministered to your necessities. Men were free to enter any pursuit or line of business unrestrained, except by the competition of other single individuals engaged in like enterprises, and find a market for their labor and their products. That was the age of individualism that followed the eventful struggle of 1861. At that period State legislation bore lightly upon the citizen, and the very largest possible liberty was the possession of all classes. But the war taught us other lessons than those of politics. It taught us the power of cooperation. We learned from that eventful struggle what it meant to mass a great body of men and capital in a single enterprise. Surrounded as we were by such opportunities, we early found that we wanted to produce great results and produce them on an enormous scale; consequently we invaded every avenue of commerce with this new theory of production. The home wagon maker was swept off his feet by the mass of men and improved machinery that could make a thousand wagons while he made one. The shoemaker, with his crude methods and antiquated tools, was engulfed by thousands of other shoemakers with new machinery in the employment of a single man. The woolen mill on the small head of back water in some stream was overtaken by a company that could clothe a community while he was making material for a single garment. That is collectivism. The transition from one condition to the other, from individualism in economics to collectivism in economics, was borne with the evolution that followed the Union of the States. Do not understand that I deprecate the change. I indorse it. It gave us a new civilization, and by this transition new forces were inducted into our national life that thereby make us great. Such changes were in the proper line of our commercial destiny.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called; thereupon 220 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he presents herewith the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal. The committee will resume its sitting.

Thereupon the committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted by the roll call I was attempting to show the effect of combinations with large numbers of men and vast amounts of capital upon our economic conditions. In this new environment of collectivism the power of groups of men organized into stock companies and financed by other men acting in concert overshadowed the individual, the community, the State with the magnitude of their power. The success of such massing of men and capital not only astonished the promoters but astonished the whole commercial world. In these colossal changes the individual was driven by force of the very change itself from his unlimited field of election of employment. His circle of personal liberty for his life business was narrowed because the field of his employment became more and more restricted through the absorption of his individual opportunities by corporations that swept by him in their constantly accumulating power like a torrent in a stream. The transition from individualism to collectivism, as you know, massed great bodies of men into a single community following a single activity. The independence of a citizen was partially lost because the diversity of daily employment and the freedom of the citizen to elect his employment was transferred to the corporations that in a measure compelled his employment. Men under our form of government have a right to feel secure, no matter in what they may be engaged, and at all times have a right to seek that protection from the State that is designed to promote always the public good. It is a singular coincidence that as the magnitude of single lines of employment developed the interests of the State became involved and restrictive legislation upon the powers and duties of the corporations the State had created began to be written upon the statute books. Men before me know that for nearly a generation the strength of the corporation has been matched against the power of the State to control it. We learned the impotency of the State to protect the liberties and the property rights that belonged to the local citizen when they became involved in interstate commerce as against the power of corporations that sought to control prices and destroy competition.

The same citizen who was jealous of his rights under State government and condemned the Federal power for its attempted absorption of the States' prerogative turned away from his State to the Federal Government, because of its strength, for his protection. The theory of State rights in an unrestricted sense found its greatest censure in its incapacity to protect a State from the advancing interests of those close and compact organizations. Men deeply interested in the protection of personal rights demanded Federal legislation and restriction in response to the determined power of organized capital. Hence these propositions with which we have been engaged have come to us for solution. I believe in big business; not in destructive big business, but in business that grows big by legitimate and lawful means and through which permeates a high moral tone of social justice. This is an age of big business, and I doubt whether we would be able to seriously check its growth even if it was desirable to do so. We shall do well if we are able to control it so that it shall not become an outlaw among the forces that tend to our marvelous commercial development. My faith is weak in our ability to preserve for the small dealer and trader a fair competition in a contest with unlimited capital and perfect management that gives the consumer as good an article at a cheaper price. The Federal Government may control the commerce of an article, but if it is a stable product it can not control its production. So long as it can be put upon the market at a profit, so long will the production continue to increase in volume. We are overwhelmed by the magnitude of our enterprises. Their stupendous character can not be comprehended. Unlimited commercial power envelops our national life and its magnitude turns us into day dreamers as to their possibilities for the future.

The Republican Party went out of power because it refused to enter the contest where was forged into Federal law a recognition of those principles that lie at the very base of our prosperity and the recognized personal rights of the citizen. Let me call your attention to another direction to illustrate the power of corporations. Some of them command more resources and occupy territory greater than a single State. With their vast systems of business they have put to flight every opposition that sought to check and control them, except the Federal Government itself. This is the situation: This colossal force in the business and transportation world, moving in a single line, with a single ultimate purpose, with complete unity of action, converging power under the command and generalship of one head, like that of the house of Morgan, not alone in money and credits, but in steel, cotton, coal, meats, and transportation, is so extensive that no man can measure it. These mighty institutions mingle and interlock their directorates with each other so that the entire economic force of society is involved in their power and shaped and fashioned at their will. These forces in the business enterprises of the people not alone affect our social fabric, but, unless checked and controlled, may seek, if they have not already done so, to become a dominating force in the politics of this country.

No man can measure their influence who has not observed their methods and studied their possibilities. That their further development either in scope or power unrestrained is inimicable to the public good admits of no denial. The problem of control, at least in some degree, is up to us. The interests of a hundred millions of people, however, must not be jeopardized by legislation that destroys liberty in business except as the exercise of that liberty invades the domain of public justice, nor must it paralyze the effectiveness of capital operating along legitimate lines, even though massed for the accomplishment of great purposes. That the recent legislation tends to a stronger centralized government must be admitted by all. As questions develop into national prominence involving the rights of more than a single State, they of necessity come within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The interstate-commerce act, whose powers we have sought to enlarge—our pure-food laws, the white-slave act, the migratory bird law, the antitrust legislation that we passed yesterday, the assumed right of the Federal Government to take over in the interest of the people the water-power privileges in navigable rivers—all illustrate the tendency to enlarge the powers of the Federal Government at the expense of the State. I have invited your attention to this short discussion of the transition of our whole industrial system from individualism to collectivism to show you how the economic forces of society are gradually but certainly passing from State to Federal control.

The business of the citizen is as much entitled to freedom from restraint as his political freedom is. It is the duty of the Congress to maintain that freedom. When business becomes monopolistic it becomes oppressive; when it becomes oppressive it assumes and exercises special privileges. Two classes are interested in commercial and economic freedom—the consuming public and the small business man. Both classes are always the victims of trust and monopolistic control. There is room in the commerce of this Republic for all. There is no room in American democracy for oppression, either political or economic. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time did the gentleman consume?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana yields back eight minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech of the Secretary of the Navy recently made in New York City at the Naval League banquet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a speech made by the Secretary of the Navy at a recent banquet. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, for the fifth time since 1776, when, on the 4th of July of that memorable year, those stern patriots signed the Declaration of Independence, we again find ourselves engaged in the possibilities of another war; our warships are now anchored in Mexican waters and our troops occupy Mexican soil. The flag floats over Vera Cruz, and we have entered upon a task which may well give us pause for serious reflection. Mexico is a rugged and mountainous country and the fanatical zeal of its inhabitants in defending their country may make our problem difficult.

We can not, therefore, be too careful in considering what we have undertaken in our conflict with Mexico. True, we have men and money and resources sufficiently adequate to pursue such a campaign, and there can be no doubt of the result, no matter what the stern demands of the war may require.

All the great wars, as shown by history, had their inception in small beginnings, but ere they had ended many neighboring States became involved. Beginning with 1792 and coming down to 1815, nearly all Europe was little else than an armed camp, while the enormous debt then incurred is even grievously felt to this day. The Crimean War, indeed, was but an echo of the 23 years of deadly conflict between the nations. The struggle of 1854–1856 involved all Russia, England, France, and Italy.

Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to say that in the face of the present struggle we are very fortunate that we have among the colored portion of our population near 12,000,000 American citizens, historically known as a fighting force in all the wars of the past, a people who have won the right to stand in the front rank of the world's best fighters.

Perhaps the country is not aware of this great military resource which it has in our colored population. This is a fighting strength that may well enable us to hope for success in any struggle. But before going further into this question, let me outline in a brief manner the task we have set for ourselves in Mexico.

MEXICO.

Mexico has to-day a population of about 16,000,000 people. Its fighting strength is out of all proportion to its normal population. The Mexican women are often employed as an effective fighting force, and must always be reckoned with by any invading army. We have already had an example of Army service under tropical conditions as set forth in the Philippine country. It therefore behooves us not to underrate or belittle our Mexican foes. Should we enter upon this war it must not be forgotten that the Mexicans now have all the modern equipment needed for the prosecution of a combat. They have Maxim guns, improved rifles, telegraphic accessories, mountain batteries, and the like, none of which were possessed by the Filipinos. We may thus form some estimate of the task which confronts us. We must also reckon with the climatic conditions, which are unfavorable to Americans. In 1846, when the population of Mexico did not exceed 6,000,000, we put in the field at that time an army of more than 100,000 men. That war lasted two years, and would have lasted longer had not the Mexicans, then as now, been torn asunder by civil dissensions. In the two years the number of deaths from tropical fever exceeded the number killed in battle.

If we enter upon a war with Mexico now, we must be prepared to raise an army of 500,000 men and count on a 10-year conflict, a thing too horrible to contemplate.

COLORED SOLDIERS IN REVOLUTIONARY WAR.

CALEB BARBOUR, THE NEGRO SCOUT IN THE REVOLUTION, THE HERO OF STONY POINT BATTLE.

It will surprise many scholars familiar with Revolutionary history to learn that one of the most daring feats of the War of the Revolution was performed by Caleb Barbour, a free negro of New York, and that by his aid Gen. Anthony Wayne was able to recapture from the British Stony Point by surprise July 16, 1779.

Stony Point, with its almost inaccessible heights, was the recognized key to the British position in New York. It was the route by the old French and Indian road into Canada, whence the British drew most of their supplies. The British took it after a stubborn fight May 31, 1779, and since that time, urged by Washington, Gen. Wayne had planned its recapture, but with little hope of success, when Barbour, famous as a scout in the American service, returned one day with the British countersign, and thus armed he led the American forces 1,200 strong at the dead of night up the perilous heights and into the British lines and to victory.

In Steele's "History of the United States," page 130, is given the following:

> The capture of Stony Point was one of the most brilliant exploits of the war. The countersign, which curiously enough was "the fort is ours," was obtained by a negro, who was in the habit of selling strawberries to the British. He guided the troops in the darkness to the causeway leading over the flooded marshes around to the foot of the hill on which the fort was situated.

> The unsuspecting sentinel having received the countersign was pleasantly chatting with the negro when he was suddenly seized and gagged. An instant more and the deafening shouts told that the victory was won. The British loss was 63 killed and 553 wounded and prisoners, while the American loss was 15 killed and 83 wounded. According to the numbers engaged Stony Point was one of the bloodiest encounters of the War of the Revolution, and by its capture Gen. Gates's victory at Saratoga was rendered possible and the Americans, by their possession of this important strategic point, were able to cut off Gen. Burgoyne from his base of supplies in Canada. Barbour served through the entire campaign and undoubtedly contributed more to the ultimate defeat of the British arms in that section than any other one man.

The sources of American history on this particular topic are somewhat meager. Many of our recent historians fail to make any mention whatever concerning the early enlistments in the American Army of colored soldiers. Truthfully speaking, the colored soldier has played an important as well as a vital part in the military history of this country. I shall refer to a few of these events, which will prove beyond any controversy the heroism of the American soldier of color.

Color prejudice, Mr. Chairman, is said to be a species of injustice, so arrogant in its decrees as to be termed an iniquity in itself. It is destitute of all reason, and in its operations it actually refuses to countenance so much as an appeal from its unreasoning maxims.

The colored man in this country has been a loyal soldier, and his record is coeval with that of the history of our country. Starting in the year 1775, with the Revolutionary War, history tells us that Varnum's Rhode Island Battalion was the first large aggregation of colored troops which served in any war, numbering some 3,000 men. These were all volunteers, and enlisted from the States of Connecticut, New York, and New Hampshire. Each of these States also furnished a company in addition to these individual enlistments. Thus before the close of this war there were few companies, brigades, or regiments which did not contain some colored men as soldiers.

These companies and brigades appear to have been made up from the free colored people of the States; but before the war closed many slaves were pressed into the service of the Army, as the slaveholders did not care to lose their human property, as they termed it. Hence even at that early period it became the policy of the country to use colored troops in our military conflicts.

The issue of employing slaves to fight our battles nevertheless became a burning one, and in May, 1775, the Massachusetts committee of safety voted that thereafter "only free men should be enlisted as soldiers." During that same year, in the month of July, Gen. Gates, then in command, issued an order prohibiting further colored enlistments, though still retaining in the service all who had up to that time enlisted.

As an evidence of the heroism of the negro soldier in the early period of the country I quote the following from the Annals of Congress, under date of December 5, 1775:

To the honorable General Court of the Massachusetts Bay:

The subscribers beg leave to report to your honorable house—which we do in justice to the character of so brave a man—that under our observation we declare that a negro man named Salem Poor, of Col. Frye's regiment, Capt. Ames's company, in the late Battle of Charleston, behaved like an experienced officer as well as an excellent soldier.

To set forth particulars of his conduct would be tedious. We would only beg to say in the person of this negro centers a brave and gallant soldier. The reward due to so great and distinguished a character we submit to Congress.

Jona Bremer, colonel; Thomas Nixon, lieutenant colonel; Joseph Baker, lieutenant; Jonas Richardson, captain; Ebenezer Varnam, second lieutenant; William Smith, captain; Richard Welsh, lieutenant; William Prescott, colonel; Ephm. Corey, lieutenant; Eliphalett Bodwell, sergeant; William Hudson Ballard, captain; John Morton, sergeant.

This is, indeed, a splendid and a well-attested tribute to the gallantry of a worthy negro soldier of the Revolutionary War, and is only one of the many instances wherein black men offered their lives as willing sacrifices for a country the people of which for years held their race in bondage.

The record also shows that Gen. Washington, on the 30th of December, 1775, issued a proclamation authorizing the enlistment of free colored people. Those soldiers bore an honorable part in all the engagements from Bunker Hill to Yorktown. History records some very noted instances of valor displayed by individual colored Revolutionary soldiers, among which may be mentioned the engagement which resulted in the killing of the English Maj. Pitcairn in the thick of the fight by Peter Salem, a colored patriot, and also may be mentioned the heroism of Jordan Freeman at Fort Griswold, who destroyed the English Maj. Montgomery.

Gen. Washington's proclamation of 1775 to Congress on the matter of colored troops reads as follows:

It has been represented to me that the free negroes who have served in this army are very much dissatisfied at being discarded. As it is to be apprehended that they may seek employ in the ministerial army, I have presumed to depart from the resolution respecting them and have given license for their being enlisted. (Vol. 3, pp. 218–219, Sparks's Washington.)

Congress on the 16th of January, 1776, decided the whole question submitted by Washington by the passage of the following act:

That the free negroes who have served faithfully in the Army at Cambridge may be reenlisted therein, but no others. (Vol. 2, p. 26, Journal of Congress.)

The colored soldiers took a vital part in the capture of Maj. Gen. Prescott at Newport during the Revolutionary period, while their gallant defense of their beloved commander, Col. Greene, when he was surprised and murdered at Croton River, May 13, 1781, after the last of his faithful guards had been shot and cut down, will ever remain a monument to their valor and patriotism. And in the same war, at the Battle of Rhode Island, a battalion of 400 colored troops withstood three separate and distinct charges from 1,500 Hessian soldiers led by Count Donop, beating them back with such tremendous loss that the count, fearing lest his men would kill him if he went into battle with them again for having exposed them to such slaughter, at once applied for his personal exchange.

The Historian Bancroft tells us that during the Revolutionary period the right of free negroes to bear arms was little disputed. Bancroft states that these soldiers took their place not in a separate corps but in the ranks with the white soldiers, and our pension rolls show that their names are still borne side by side on this roster of fame of their country.

Mr. Chairman, my purpose is to picture for the House and for the country an historic parallel. I want to show to the House, to the country, and to the world by an unmistakable parallel that if you will place on one side of the ledger what these people have accomplished as American soldiers and on the other side of the ledger the inhuman suggestions to segregate and to discriminate against them by acts of Congress, that every unbiased man in this country of ours will at once agree that such segregation, such discriminations as proposed by bills in the present Congress, should no longer be attempted; that these people have won their rights—their civil and political rights—that it is now time to call a halt and to unbend a little in their favor, especially in the face of another war. This is the parallel I wish to exhibit.

In the main the War of 1812 was fought upon the water, and the colored men in the American Navy stood in the ratio of about 1 to 6. Commodore Perry, because of the large number of negroes sent to him, at first made some complaint, but later on paid a high tribute to their bravery and efficiency. Capt. Shaler, who had charge of the armed brig General Thompson, speaks thus of an engagement between his vessel and a British frigate at the time:

The name of one of my poor fellows who was killed ought to be registered in the book of fame and remembered as long as bravery is a virtue. He was a black man, by name John Johnson. A 24-pounder struck him in the hip and took away all the lower part of his body. In this state the poor brave fellow lay on the deck, and several times exclaimed to his shipmates: "Fire away, my boys; no haul a color down."

Another black man by the name of John Davis, who was struck in much the same manner, repeatedly requested to be thrown overboard, saying that he was only in the way of others. I know of nothing finer in history than these.

But let me read for the information of the House and the country what the great apostle of the Democratic Party, Gen. Andrew Jackson, had to say about the valor of colored soldiers while he was President of the United States. Writing under date of December 18, 1814, he stated:

To the men of color, soldiers:

From the shores of Mobile I called you to arms. I invited you to share in the perils and to divide the glory of your white countrymen. I expected much from you, for I was not uninformed of those qualities which must render you so formidable to an invading foe. I knew you could endure hunger and thirst and all the hardships of war. I knew that you loved the land of your nativity, and that, like ourselves, you had to defend all that is most dear to man. But you surpass my hopes. I have found in you, united to those qualities, that noble enthusiasm that impels to great deeds.

Soldiers: The President of the United States shall be informed of your conduct on the present occasion, and the voice of the representatives of the American Nation shall applaud your valor. The enemy is near. His sails cover the lakes, but the brave are united; and if he finds us contending among ourselves it will be for the prize of valor and fame, its noblest reward.

During the War of 1812 a charging column of the American Army was repulsed and thrown into great disorder. A colored soldier, a private in the ranks, at the risk of his life, sprang upon a horse near by and with great heroic effort rallied the troops and led them back to a second charge, in this way completely routing the enemy. This colored soldier was afterwards rewarded by Gen. Jackson with the honorary title of major. Under the laws which existed at that time Gen. Jackson could not commission this gallant solider, and after the close of the war he returned to his home in Nashville, Tenn., where he lived for many years thereafter and was highly respected by the citizens of all races.

Again, at the battle of New Orleans, the colored troops stood with Gen. Jackson behind a hastily constructed breastwork, and 400 of their sharpshooters helped to hurl back the flower of the English army, subsequently to the English defeat. Gen. Jackson also commanded the colored troops in the fight against Lord Peckenham at New Orleans.

And now, Mr. Chairman, for the information of the House and the country, I feel it my duty to read at this point Gen. Jackson's proclamation to the colored soldiers while commanding the forces in the War of 1814. I desire that it shall be inserted in full in the RECORD as part of my remarks:

[From Nile's Register, Vol. VII, p. 205.]

GEN. JACKSON'S PROCLAMATION TO THE NEGROES.

HEADQUARTERS, SEVENTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
Mobile, September 21, 1814.

To the free colored inhabitants of Louisiana:

Through a mistaken policy you have heretofore been deprived of a participation in the glorious struggle for national rights in which our country is engaged. This no longer shall exist.

As sons of freedom you are now called upon to defend our most inestimable blessing. As Americans, your country looks with confidence to her adopted children for a valorous support, as a faithful return for the advantages enjoyed under her mild and equitable government. As fathers, husbands, and brothers, you are summoned to rally around the standard of the eagle to defend all which is dear in existence.

Your country, although calling for your exertions, does not wish you to engage in her cause without amply remunerating you for the services rendered. Your intelligent minds are not to be led away by false representations. Your love of honor would cause you to despise the man who should attempt to deceive you. In the sincerity of a soldier and the language of truth I address you.

To every noble-hearted, generous freeman of color volunteering to serve during the present contest with Great Britain, and no longer, there will be paid the same bounty, in money and lands, now received by the white soldiers of the United States, viz, $124 in money and 160 acres of land. The noncommissioned officers and privates will also be entitled to the same monthly pay, and daily rations, and clothes, furnished to any American soldier.

On enrolling yourselves in companies the major general commanding will select officers for your government from your white fellow citizens. Your noncommissioned officers will be appointed from among yourselves.

One regard will be paid to the feelings of freemen and soldiers. You will not, by being associated with white men in the same corps, be exposed to improper comparisons or unjust sarcasm. As a distinct, independent battalion or regiment, pursuing the path of glory, you will, undivided, receive the applause and gratitude of your countrymen.

To assure of the sincerity of my intentions and my anxiety to engage your invaluable services to our country, I have communicated my wishes to the governor of Louisiana, who is fully informed as to the manner of enrollment, and will give you every necessary information on the subject of this address.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General Commanding.

Three months after the above proclamation was issued, on December 18, 1814, Gen. Jackson reviewed all the troops, white and colored, in New Orleans, and at the close of the review a white soldier by the name of Edward Livingston, who was an aide on the staff of Gen. Jackson, read the above now famous address to the enthusiastic Army.

At this point I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that I am indebted in a large degree to Mr. Daniel Murray, a representative of the colored race, who has for many years been connected in an official way with our Congressional Library, for the many important historical facts brought out by me in this historical parallel. Mr. Murray has been connected with the Library of Congress for twenty or more years, and has gathered for publication an entire encyclopedia of the colored race and every historical event of importance in which that race has been connected.

THE LATE CIVIL WAR.

The first systematic attempt to organize colored troops in our Civil War was the so-called "Hunter regiment," by Gen. David Hunter. The first order issued by the War Department on this subject bears the date of May 7, 1862, although this order did not have the full authority of the department behind it. The second of the kind bears date of August 6, 1862, and was issued to the First Kansas Colored Troops, with Richard J. Hinton as colonel, and which antedates Lincoln's Proclamation of Emancipation.

We had in the Civil War, all told, about 178,975 colored troops, the deaths amounting to some 36,847. These troops were organized into—

Regiments of Infantry	138
Regiments of Cavalry	6
Regiments of Heavy Artillery	14
Regiments of Light Artillery	1

They participated in 449 battles, and a few of the colored regiments had the largest number of men killed in any one single engagement. The States furnishing these troops were:

Alabama	2,969
Arkansas	5,526
Colorado Territory	95
Connecticut	1,764
Delaware	954
District of Columbia	3,269
Florida	1,044
Georgia	3,486
Illinois	1,811
Indiana	1,537
Iowa	440
Kansas	2,080
Kentucky	23,703
Louisiana	24,052
Maine	104
Maryland	8,718
Massachusetts	3,966
Michigan	1,387
Minnesota	104
Mississippi	17,869
Missouri	8,344
New Hampshire	125
New Jersey	1,185
New York	4,125
North Carolina	5,035
Ohio	5,092
Pennsylvania	8,612
Rhode Island	1,837
South Carolina	5,462
Tennessee	20,133
Texas	47
Vermont	120
Virginia	5,723
West Virginia	196
Wisconsin	165

Our Civil War had many incidents not recorded by any of the historians which showed the value of colored men as a military force. For instance, perhaps few persons are aware that there were several thousand colored soldiers enlisted in white regiments, as may be seen upon an examination of our pension roll, while quite a number were officers in such regiments.

Napoleon paid them a tribute when he transferred Louisiana to the United States in the year 1803, when he was about to engage in a death struggle with England. He said at that time that—

If a mere handful of poorly equipped negro soldiers in Santo Domingo could hold at bay for two years and finally defeat over 60,000 of Europe's best soldiers, I could not hold Louisiana against England's great navy.

Napoleon therefore sold Louisiana. He also stated at another time, with extreme admiration for the valor of the black soldiers of Haiti, that—with such soldiers, and led by me, I could defy Europe in arms.

It is also little known that from 1861 to 1865 Louisiana is credited with contributing 24,052 colored soldiers, the largest quota furnished by any single State. Kentucky comes next with 23,703, and then Tennessee with 20,133 men. No other State save Mississippi, which had an enrollment of 17,869, is credited with double figures in its enrollment of colored soldiers in the Civil War.

I do not lose sight of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that in every period of our country nearly every section has at times been imbued with extreme racial prejudice on the ground of color and without being able to assign any rational grounds therefor. I do think, however, that when we impartially compare the loyalty of our colored citizens, especially in the time of war, contrasting it with the almost inhuman propaganda of race distinction on our part, that the time has now arrived when we should call a halt and forever obliterate all efforts and measures, in Congress or out, which aim at racial segregation and discrimination on color grounds. Hence I appeal to the men of this Congress, to the Representatives of all parties and from every section of the country, to take steps, by their vote or otherwise, to take from the calendars of Congress bills and resolutions drawn in the light of the dead past, the sole purpose of which is to draw more acutely the color line by national legislation. This we ought to do before adjournment. This we ought to do in view of the fact that ere long we may again have to call upon colored Americans to help fight our battles in Mexico and elsewhere.

WAR WITH SPAIN.

During the outbreak of hostilities between the United States and Spain in 1898 the Republican Party, to demonstrate its loyalty to the broad and humane principles set forth in the Declaration of Independence, and in order to give legal sanction to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution, called into the military service for that conflict over 15,000 colored soldiers. Of this number nearly 300 were officers, a fact which is without precedent in all our military history. The service of these men was characterized by gallantry and bravery, and at the time aroused the admiration of the world. We all know that the valor of the black troops at San Juan Hill largely contributed to the victory achieved on that occasion, as the department records fully testify. As a further mark of recognition for the heroic services, President McKinley in 1899 issued his famous order for the organization of the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Infantry Regiments, composed of colored men.

The Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, as well as the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, all colored troops, made splendid records in Cuba and the Philippines, and it is said that to-day there are no finer horsemen who carry carbines and sabers than these troopers. History also records that the Tenth Cavalry arrived at Santiago just in the nick of time to save the whole command from utter annihilation by the Spanish forces. The Twenty-fourth Infantry performed a large service in both Cuba and the Philippines, not only in the matter of fighting but also in the matter of the law-abiding conduct of its members in foreign lands. In the Cuban campaign many of the colored companies were led by their own noncommissioned officers, and there seems to be no doubt that among the 300 officers of colored men in the Volunteer service at that time there were many of these officers who measured well up to the standard in every emergency.

During the Philippine trouble it is related by Dr. Joseph M. Heller, late major and surgeon, United States Army, that during the campaign Capt. Bachelor, a North Carolinian by birth and a hero if ever there was one, with 350 colored troopers, a brave and splendidly disciplined little band, marched and fought their way over a distance of 310 miles in one month. The route selected was over roads so difficult as to be almost impossible of travel. In fact, the route did not really deserve the name of roads, but were simply trails, through which the men plodded along, sinking at times to their knees in mud.

The expedition at the time was chasing Aguinaldo through the northern and central portions of Luzon and toward the China Sea. Dr. Heller stated that he never saw men show truer courage than these troops with Capt. Bachelor. They were insufficiently clothed for the long march, and without guides in a strange region, but through chilling nights and sweltering days they forded 123 streams and crossed precipices and mountains where the daily average of ascent and descent was not less than 8,000 feet. For three weeks these troops lived on unaccustomed and insufficient foodstuffs and drove the enemy twice from strong positions. They captured many of the natives and set free more than 400 prisoners. They finally forced the surrender of the commander of the insurrecto forces and made the people of Luzon enthusiastic advocates of American supremacy. No other single command during the Philippine trouble stood as many hardships or accomplished so much as these negro soldiers under Capt. Bachelor. Such was the report made at the time; and although Gen. Lawton was killed, Capt. Bachelor carried out his verbal orders, and died of cholera in the Philippines, thus going to his grave without any further reward of recognition for one of the bravest expeditions ever attempted by soldiers in modern times.

A writer on military subjects, referring to the incident, wrote that—

When Alexander, in quest of kingdoms, had laid Egypt at his feet, he fell against Abyssinia, and was utterly repulsed. L'Overture and Dessalines whipped England, France, and Spain, and a half million black men whipped one-half of Europe. And for 30 years Cuban negroes fought Spain for political freedom, and finally, with the aid of the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry of the United States, fought for and won their industrial and political emancipation.

In a report made by the Surgeon General of the Army under date of October 31, 1912, it is found that the negro soldier loses less time in the Army service by reason of sickness than does the white enlisted soldier. The report in question states:

The negro soldier has demonstrated his ability to serve with less loss of time from active duty by reason of sickness than the white enlisted man. The noneffective rate of the colored soldier was 25.88, while that of the white was 33.60. (From report of Surg. Gen. George H. Torney, 1912.)

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I desire to place in the RECORD this historical data as an object lesson and a living parallel to demonstrate for all time why there should be no segregation bills offered against our colored people; why Congress, at least on the grounds of common justice, should call a halt in this matter of color discrimination, and as an appeal to the men composing this Congress who have offered such measures to be fair enough on the grounds of Americanism to forever strike such measures from the calendars of Congress.

I insert the bills to which I refer:

[Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

[Sixty-third Congress, first session.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Mr. ASWELL of Louisiana introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and ordered to be printed:

[Sixty-third Congress, first session.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 17, 1913.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 6150) to require street railways carrying passengers in their cars within the District of Columbia to provide equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races, and to prescribe punishments and penalties for violating its provisions.

Be it enacted, etc., That within two months after the passage of this act each and every person or corporation operating a street railway carrying passengers in cars within the District of Columbia shall provide equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races, by providing two or more cars or by dividing the cars by a partition or by an adjustable screen which may be made movable so as to allow adjustment in a manner suited to the requirements of the traffic and so as to secure separate accommodations for the white and colored races.

SEC. 2. That no person shall be permitted to occupy a seat in a car or compartment other than the one assigned to them on account of the race to which they belong.

SEC. 3. That officers of such street cars shall have the power and are required to assign each passenger to the car or compartment used for the race to which such passenger belongs. Any passenger insisting upon going into a car or compartment to which by race he or she does not belong shall be liable to a fine of $25, or in lieu thereof be imprisoned for a period of not more than 30 days in the District Jail; and any officer of any street railway insisting on assigning any passenger to a car or compartment other than the one set aside for the race to which said passenger belongs shall be liable to a fine of $25, or in lieu thereof to imprisonment for a period of not more than 30 days in the District Jail; and should any passenger refuse to occupy the car or compartment to which he or she is assigned by the officer of such street railway, said officer shall have the power to refuse to carry such passenger on his car or cars, and for such refusal neither he nor the street railway company shall be liable for damages in any court.

SEC. 4. That all officers and directors of street railway companies that shall refuse or neglect to comply with the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be fined not less than $100, or be imprisoned in the District Jail not less than 60 days and not more than 6 months, and any conductor or other employee of such street car company having charge of the same who shall refuse or neglect to carry out the provisions of this act shall, on conviction, be fined not less than $25, or be imprisoned in the District Jail for not less than 10 days nor more than 30 days for each and every offense. All street railway companies carrying passengers in the District of Columbia shall keep this law posted up in a conspicuous place in each and every car and at their transfer stations: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as applying to nurses attending children of the other race.

Give this people the chance for existence to which their patriotism and valor entitle them; encourage them in the race for success; let them realize that they are a desirable part of our citizenship; help them to help themselves; spread the doctrine of liberty among them; sow the seeds of patriotism in their hearts, and in time of need the Nation can be certain of reaping a harvest of gratitude and devotion.

[By unanimous consent, Mr. HARRISON was granted permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

[Mr. GILLETT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL].

[Mr. KINDEL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK].

[Mr. CLARK of Florida addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I had intended, under the five-minute rule, when the item in the pending bill making an appropriation for the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, located at Hot Springs, S. Dak., was reached, to make some remarks with reference to that institution. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] having made reference to this sanitarium in his remarks made to-day prompts me in discussing the matter now.

On the 29th of April the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]—I regret that he does not appear to be present—made a speech in the House complaining of the management of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, and inserted in the RECORD some communications containing various charges received by him from members of the institution, three of whom had been recently expelled. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] says that he will insert in the RECORD some communications containing complaints that he has received, similar, I presume, to the communications received by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman will find on the same page of the RECORD a statement made by myself, which I now wish publicly to withdraw, because, having investigated them, I find that the charges are not as I had reason at the time to believe that they were—not of the atrocious character that I thought, from the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am very glad that the gentleman from New York makes that statement, because I had intended to comment upon the remark made by him when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] made the speech that I have referred to, wherein the gentleman from New York assumed to accept as true the charges made by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GOULDEN. I based my statement then on the assumption that the statements made by the gentleman from Illinois were true, as given to the House at that time.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that the gentleman from New York was moved for the moment by the eloquence of the gentleman from Illinois, and I am not surprised that when he had an opportunity to inquire as to the facts he changed his opinion and that he now withdraws the statement that he made. Mr. Chairman, it is to be deplored that Members of the House will accept, as often is the case, villifying statements reflecting upon officials in high and responsible positions and bring them before this House before they have verified and inquired as to the truth or falsity of the charges. The communications used as the basis for the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] contain charges that, if true, would demand the censure of this House upon those in charge of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium and their immediate removal from their positions, as no one would attempt to justify a continuation of conditions as set forth by the persons making the complaint. I submit, however, that before any Member of this House accepts such statements and makes them public, he ought to first satisfy himself that the charges are true, and without assuming to state whether these charges are true or not, I do not believe the gentleman from Illinois was justified in becoming responsible for them to the extent that he did in bringing them to the attention of the House.

At the outset I want to say that the Battle Mountain Sanitarium is not located in the district I have the honor of representing. It is located at Hot Springs, in the western portion of the State, in the district represented by my colleague, Mr. MARTIN, who, if he were able to be present, would, I am sure, answer these charges and convince the House that they are without sufficient foundation to warrant anyone in condemning the board of managers and officials of the home in advance of a thorough investigation.

The Battle Mountain Sanitarium has only been in operation for a few years. It differs from the ordinary soldiers' home in that it is a sanitarium. It is a place to which members from the soldiers' homes generally throughout the country are sent who are afflicted with diseases, and particularly with tuberculosis. It is therefore more of a sanitarium than a home in the sense that we ordinarily speak of soldiers' homes.

In the years that the sanitarium has been in operation I have never had or received a single complaint from any member of the institution that the conditions were not satisfactory until I received the same complaint that was sent to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN]. When I received the charges I immediately referred them to the president of the board of managers, a gentleman whom I had known for many years and with whom I had served for a number of terms in this House when he was an honored Member thereof, and requested him to make such answer or explanation as he might wish to make. At the same time I wrote to two responsible citizens of the city of Hot Springs, which is a city of about 2,000 people, and sent them a copy of the charges, requesting that they investigate the same and write me. My purpose, Mr. Chairman, in doing this was, if I found the charges were considered to be founded on facts, to bring the same to the attention of the House in order that there might be a full and thorough investigation.

I believe that the soldiers' homes of the country should be conducted with a view to the comfort and care of those who have rendered military service to the country and who are now, through age or disability incurred in the service, unable to provide for themselves, and that they should have the best of food and medical attention and be treated with the highest consideration from every standpoint, and I would be the last one to justify continuation of conditions such as are charged in connection with the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, but I would not accept such charges and condemn the entire management of the National Soldiers' Home Board and the officials in charge of this sanitarium until there had been a thorough investigation.

Before receiving replies to the letters written by me, as I have stated, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] made his speech and put the charges in the RECORD, and I presume the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] will incorporate in his remarks charges that he has received reflecting upon the management of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium.

In order that it may be known what the president of the board of managers had to say with relation to the charges made, I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read a letter from that official, under date of April 24, 1914, which letter was written before the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] was made.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will read the letter in the time of the gentleman from South Dakota.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
346 Broadway, New York, N. Y., April 24, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES H. BURKE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: 1. I am in receipt of your letter of April 18, 1914, relative to disturbers dropped from the rolls of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, with letter from Walich, Lacy, and Yount, and have to state that they were dropped from the rolls for the following reasons:

"These members, patients in the tuberculosis ward, have banded together and persistently violated the rules governing conduct, and by their language and actions have kept the ward in a state of irritation and confusion. They have indulged in violent, abusive, and profane language, in the presence of the other patients, the nurses, and attendants, to and about patients, nurses, attendants, and officers. Repeated warnings have proven ineffectual, and they have continued the agitation and disturbance in the ward until their presence and association with the well-disposed patients is working a harmful and injurious effect on their peace of mind and health. In the treatment of tubercular patients quiet, rest, and peaceful surroundings are absolutely essential."

2. Their case was thoroughly investigated by a committee of Spanish War veterans who went to the Battle Mountain Sanitarium especially to hear their complaints, and, after giving them full opportunity to prove their case, recommended that they be dropped from the rolls. Proof was positive as to their bad conduct; therefore I do not feel justified in readmitting them. Their presence is a menace to the comfort, happiness, and health of other members.

3. Walich's letter returned herewith.

Respectfully, yours,

J. W. WADSWORTH,
President Board of Managers,
National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I want to call particular attention to the statement contained in the letter just read to the effect that the cases of the three men expelled from the sanitarium were thoroughly investigated by a committee of Spanish War Veterans, and they were dropped from the rolls upon their recommendation. I also want to call attention to the fact that the three men who were expelled and who made the complaints that have been referred to are not old soldiers in the sense that we understand that term. They are Spanish War veterans, men in middle life, and not aged as are those who served in the Civil War. I am sure the Members of the House will be interested in knowing just what is the age and military record of the man who is most conspicuous in making these charges. He is 47 years old, and I have his record from The Adjutant General, under date of July 31, 1913, and this is what he says:

The records show that Anthony H. Walich was enrolled May 1, 1898, at Buffalo, N. Y., and was mustered into service May 17, 1898, as a private of Company M, Sixty-fifth New York Volunteer Infantry, to serve two years, and that he was mustered out of service with the company as a private November 19, 1898, at Buffalo, N. Y.
The medical records show that this soldier was under treatment from June 10 to June 12, 1898, for ingrowing toenail of right foot.

As before stated, I sent the charges received by me to two citizens of Hot Springs, requesting them to make inquiry with reference to the charges and write me the result of their inquiry. One of these gentlemen to whom I wrote in his reply says:

I have so much confidence in the integrity and gentlemanly qualifications of the governor of the home that I do not think any criticism should be made upon him in this matter. If these men were unjustly discharged, it was by the order of the board of managers. From what I can learn Walich is a trouble maker. He has a little better than the average opinion of himself, and does not agree with anyone on most any proposition.

Mr. Chairman, two of the three men that were dropped from the rolls reside outside of South Dakota—one of them, I think, in Illinois, perhaps in the district of the gentleman from that State [Mr. FOSTER]. They have left Hot Springs and are not in South Dakota at the present time.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg to say that the gentleman I spoke of is not a resident of the district I represent.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. He is a resident of the State of Illinois, is he not?

Mr. FOSTER. He is a resident of the State of Illinois.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman from South Dakota yield for an interruption?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to say to the gentleman that I never received any communication from either of the three men named by the gentleman from South Dakota. I only referred to them in my remarks because I had heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] bring their cases upon the floor, and I was curious to know the facts.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I never met the governor of this home. Therefore I do not know him. I do not know from whence he came or upon whose authority he was appointed. Consequently I am unable to make any statement with reference to him except from hearsay. The reports that I have had touching that gentleman, the governor of this home, are that he is a man of experience and character, and that the conditions in the home under his administration are of a high order.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] inferred, if he did not state, that conditions in the national homes are not as satisfactory as conditions in the State homes. I will say that at Hot Springs, S. Dak., where the Battle Mountain Sanitarium is located, is the State soldiers' home for our State, and there is no better institution anywhere in any other State of this Union, in my opinion. I know that it is quite frequent for members of the State home to go to the Battle Mountain Sanitarium from choice, and sometimes residents of the State come from the Battle Mountain Sanitarium over to the State home. I do not know that there is any particular choice between the two institutions, but we all know from experience that especially when we are living away from our homes we get dissatisfied and discontented, and if we stop at one hotel we wish we had stopped at another. Therefore we change our places of abode. It has happened in South Dakota with men in the sanitarium and in the State home that they would change from one place to the other, but I never have heard of anyone who was a member of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium claim that he had been mistreated or that the food or the service in that institution was not of a high class until I received the complaint of the three men dropped from the rolls.

I stated that I had never met and do not know the governor of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium. I do, however, happen to know the treasurer and quartermaster of that institution, Mr. W. H. Stanley. In the charges filed and incorporated in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] is a very serious reflection upon this official. Mr. Stanley is a young man who has resided in South Dakota the greater part of his life, has held positions of much responsibility, is a man of ability and of the highest character and against whom there has never been, to my knowledge, a suggestion of improper conduct, and I have no hesitancy in asserting that an investigation of his official conduct would completely exonerate him. The charges against him in the communication to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], which will be found in the RECORD of April 29, 1914, on page 7434, are to the effect that he issued to the members of the home tobacco that was damaged and spoiled and unfit for use, and that when his attention was called to it he refused to correct it, and, to quote specifically from the charges, I read as follows:

The tobacco, you will observe, is green with mildew and is a fair sample that has been issued at this sanitarium three times a month since about August, 1913. * * * Now, the only satisfaction we the undersigned members could get to our complaints was the statement of the quartermaster that he was powerless to buy new tobacco to replace the moldy, rotten stuff dealt out to us, because he would first have to go to the great trouble of making out papers and getting the sanction of the supreme board of managers away off in New York City, and, further, that when the present stock of moldy tobacco, known as the "Fawn" brand—which, by the way, is not a standard and is entirely unknown to users of tobacco—would run out no more of that brand would be purchased by him.

He goes on further and charges that the damaged tobacco was renovated, and also charges that the quartermaster and treasurer refused to allow members to exchange the tobacco that had been issued to them for other brands, and I again quote from his letter:

I in common with other members tried to exchange it, as we sometimes used to do, with other brands that had been issued to us from time to time and as we were at that time privileged to do, when we would get tired of chewing tobacco and wanted to smoke a cigar; but we were turned down by the storekeeper of the post store, who informed us that henceforth he would not take our chewing tobacco in exchange, he being ordered so to do by the treasurer of the home, because, he explained, it was not a standard brand of tobacco and consequently could not be sold in the post store. In other words, this now rotten and moldy "Fawn" brand was good enough to give to the nonpensioners, but not nearly good enough to be placed on sale at the post store. So, plainly speaking, Mr. BUCHANAN, the charge I wish to make in common with the other comrades, whose signatures are attached to this communication, is that it was and is criminal indifference on the part of the officers of this sanitarium, especially since they were duly notified, to issue such tobacco, the use of which would not only make a well man sick but would certainly kill a sick man, especially when suffering from tuberculosis.

To give you a better idea as to what extremes these incompetent officers will go to, they, even after being informed as to the condition of this tobacco—which even no self-respecting goat would have anything to do with—deliberately added insult to injury by attempting to palm off on us that kind of tobacco by first putting it through some renovating process, which resulted in changing its appearance, and removed the tags and labels therefrom.

I have received from Maj. Stanley a communication with reference to these charges, and in order that the House may know what he has to say I will incorporate his letter in my remarks. The letter is as follows:

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM, N. H. D. V. S.,
Hot Springs, S. Dak., May 5, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES H. BURKE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BURKE: I am in receipt of your valued favor of April 30, transmitting a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 29 and inviting my attention to a speech delivered by Congressman BUCHANAN, printed on pages 7433–7434 of the RECORD, relating principally to alleged irregularities and abuses at Battle Mountain Sanitarium, a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and containing a communication from Anthony H. Walich, late a member of this branch, printed as a part of Mr. BUCHANAN'S remarks.

Although the temptation to do so is strong, it is perhaps inadvisable for me to attempt to reply at length and in detail to the vicious, slanderous, and untruthful accusations made by former members of this branch against Gov. Mattison and the treasurer and quartermaster of Battle Mountain Sanitarium and members of the Board of Managers of the National Home. It has been found, after very thorough and exhaustive investigations at various branches of the National Home, that complaints similar to these, and many of a much more serious nature—complaints of incompetence and gross negligence on the part of surgeons and other officers, of poor food and of graft and extravagance—were in nearly every instance wholly without foundation, as the testimony adduced at these hearings and the findings and conclusions of the investigators will disclose. It has been found that practically all of these complaints have been made by incorrigible members of intemperate and vicious habits, who resented any interference with their "personal liberties" or any necessary disciplinary measures adopted for their control, and in some instances by members whose minds have become perverted by disease or dissipation. It is obviously unfair for one to assume without investigation that such complaints and charges are true, and it is regrettable that they are given widespread publicity without any effort first being made to verify them. Much of the information obtained at these hearings and investigations has been submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate and House and is doubtless accessible to members who are seeking information along these lines. An investigation of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was recently made by a committee appointed for this purpose by the national organization of Spanish War Veterans, the inspection and investigation of this sanitarium having been made on March 23 and 24 by Col. Melcher G. Cockey, M. D., recently retired after 23 years of very active service as surgeon in the United States Army, and Col. Frank F. Jones, of Youngstown, Ohio. The testimony taken by these gentlemen at this sanitarium and their findings and conclusions, much of which had to do with the charges and complaints of Mr. Walich and his associates, referred to by Mr. BUCHANAN in his remarks, are probably now on file with the Committee on Military Affairs of the House or may be had, I presume, upon application to Col. Cockey, whose address is Salina, Kans.

Briefly stated, the facts in regard to the chewing tobacco are as follows: For 30 days following October 26, 1912, sealed proposals were invited by newspaper advertisement and circular letter for furnishing subsistence supplies for the quarter ending March 31, 1913, bids to be opened on November 26, 1912. Among the supplies for the furnishing of which proposals were invited was a quantity of chewing tobacco, which was specified as "a choice grade of plug tobacco, 1-pound plugs, in original packages," and a sample was required to be submitted with the proposal. Among the bidders was Franklin MacVeagh & Co., a well-known, responsible, and trustworthy wholesale grocery company of Chicago, who submitted with their proposal, in accordance with the requirements, a sample of the tobacco they proposed to furnish, known as "Spotted Fawn." This brand not being of a standard variety, and being unfamiliar to the treasurer, whose duty it was to make the awards for supplies, the sample was carefully inspected and tested by several members and employees, all of whom, without exception, pronounced the tobacco of good quality and very satisfactory. The contract for the "Spotted Fawn" chewing tobacco was therefore awarded to Franklin MacVeagh & Co. A consignment was received from them in due time and issued to members who were nonpensioners, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 262 of the home regulations. This brand of tobacco was purchased and issued regularly for four successive quarters—one year—and no complaint of it was heard by or made to the writer until after the last consignment was received and a part of it issued, when Mr. Walich, the author of the letter included in Mr. BUCHANAN'S remarks, and Mr. Yount, a subscriber to the postscript, called at the office of the writer and complained that the chewing tobacco last issued to them was moldy, hard, and unfit for use, and submitted samples in proof of their complaint. These are probably the samples sent to Congressman BUCHANAN and referred to by Walich and other complainants. Upon inquiry it was found that the samples submitted had been kept for some days in the lockers of the complainants, and had therefore become dry and hard, but examination disclosed that it had been somewhat moldy, and an investigation was promptly made. It was found that some of the inside plugs in the butt from which the tobacco in question was taken were somewhat moldy, and that a portion of the tobacco in another butt was in the same condition. Franklin MacVeagh & Co. were immediately advised of the facts and instructed to forward another shipment of tobacco to replace that found to be unfit for use. This consignment was received promptly and issued in due course, and no further complaint was heard. It is probable that this last consignment of fresh tobacco, sent to replace that rejected, is the tobacco referred to by Mr. Walich as having been put "through some renovating process which resulted in changing its appearance," as the writer was not aware that any such process had been used, and certainly none was necessary, as the objectionable tobacco was promptly returned to Franklin MacVeagh & Co. after the receipt of the new consignment.

I am informed that the storekeeper in charge of the "post-fund store" declined to accept the "Spotted Fawn" chewing tobacco in exchange for cigars or other tobacco, for the reasons that he knew nothing about the tobacco offered, as it was not a so-called standard brand; that there was no call or demand for it, and that he would have some difficulty disposing of it. The quality of the tobacco offered had nothing to do with the refusal of the storekeeper to accept it in exchange for other tobacco or cigars, as he knew nothing about it and made no inquiry concerning it.

The uniformly high quality of subsistence supplies furnished to the members of Battle Mountain Sanitarium and the excellent manner in which they are prepared and served are subjects of much favorable comment by the appreciative members, and it is inconceivable that any member, especially the tubercular members, who are supplied with the best the market affords, should complain of the quality of the food. It is, of course, inevitable that occasionally (though it rarely occurs) a shortage will occur in some article of subsistence and other supplies. It is possible that at some time the supply of port wine was temporarily exhausted, and that it was necessary for the time being to substitute sherry or grape juice; that we were short of apple butter or that plum butter or some other fruit butter had been supplied in place of it to give more of a variety, but the writer does not recall a single instance when the supply of eggs was exhausted, as was alleged by one of the complainants, and, of course, it is absolutely untrue that rotten apples, to which reference was made by Mr. BUCHANAN, were ever served to members. It is quite probable, however, that Mr. BUCHANAN has samples of such apples received from the complainants, purporting to have been issued to them while members of Battle Mountain Sanitarium.

Thanking you for calling my attention to the remarks of Congressman BUCHANAN as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD relating to complaints and charges made against the officers of Battle Mountain Sanitarium, and for giving me an opportunity to make a statement of the facts so far as they relate to the department of the treasurer and quartermaster of Battle Mountain Sanitarium, I am, with personal regards and best wishes,

Sincerely, yours,

WM. T. STANLEY.

Extract from letter dated May 6:

In my letter forwarded to you yesterday reference was made to the attempt of the complainants to exchange the tobacco issued to them for other merchandise at the post-fund store. In this connection I intended to state that paragraph 262 of the home regulations provides that "free issues (of tobacco) will be denied to any member detected in disposing of his allowance to others," and that the storekeeper in charge of the post-fund store has been directed not to accept any tobacco so issued in exchange.

Very respectfully,

WM. T. STANLEY.

Mr. Chairman, on April 29 last, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] made his speech, and incorporated therein the complaint against the management of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, there happened to be in that institution an old soldier whom I had known intimately for many years, a veteran of the Civil War, with a distinguished military record, a man who was a pioneer in the Dakotas, and who was known through the Northwest as a statesman, an orator, and a writer. His name is Gen. S. J. Conklin, and he resided at Clark, in my congressional district. On May 7 he wrote me a letter. I hold that letter in my hand, and I am going to quote a statement from it, because it is pertinent to the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I yield to the gentleman as much time as he desires.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Gen. Conklin was receiving the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and, speaking of having received the RECORD of April 29, he says:

I loaned my copy, and it can not be found. It contains remarks from Mr. BUCHANAN, Congressman from Illinois, in regard to a resolution to have a committee appointed for the investigation of affairs at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, at Hot Springs, S. Dak.

The letter which he read is the rottenest thing that I have ever met with; there is not one iota of truth in the whole matter, as will appear if an investigation is ever had.

Mr. Chairman, that letter was written, as I have stated, by a man of prominence and high standing, and any statement from him refuting the charges of mismanagement of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium would have great weight with me. Upon receipt of his letter I wrote him, requesting that he make a further and more detailed statement regarding the charges and with reference to the general conditions in the sanitarium. I regret that before he received my letter he was called by death, and therefore I have no statement from him except the one that I have read.

Mr. Chairman, I have a letter from the governor of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, which refers to the charges against his administration, which I wish to also incorporate in my remarks. The letter is as follows:

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM,
Hot Springs, S. Dak., May 6, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES H. BURKE, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: The treasurer and quartermaster of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, William H. Stanley, has just called my attention to a speech delivered by Congressman BUCHANAN before the House of Representatives and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD April 29, relating to irregularities, etc., at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, a branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Among other statements made by the honorable gentleman from Illinois was this: "I have evidence on file in my office, Mr. Speaker, regarding conditions and treatment of patients in this institution that would bring the blush of shame to the face of any patriotic, public-spirited citizen. One of the instances cited to me was that of a certain patient who complained to the governor regarding some poor food a certain orderly had served him. Instead of investigating the matter properly himself the governor notified the orderly that a complaint had been made, and at the same time tells him who made the complaint. The result was that the orderly, in connection with one or more of his companions, attacked the patient while in bed and severely beat him up. The patient endeavored to secure redress through the governor, but was denied. He filed suit against the orderly on the charge of assault and battery. But when the patient requested the governor to permit several other members of the home who had witnessed the assault to leave the home to testify in the trial, the governor flatly refused. I was further informed that the governor brought his influence to bear upon the prosecuting attorney, with the result that the attorney, who previously was very willing to take up the matter, absolutely refused to go on with the case," etc.

In reply to the above I wish to state the actual facts, which are as follows: Trouble arose between a certain ward man and a certain patient, but did not originate from information conveyed to the ward man by the governor that the patient had complained of food served; but the trouble arose over the fact that the ward man overheard the patient applying such epithets as bums, hobos, etc., to certain patients at the tuberculosis cottage. The ward man called the patient to task for it, and the patient called the ward man vile names, such as s. o. b., etc. The ward man lost his temper and struck the patient, who was an ambulatory case. The matter was reported to the governor by the nurse in charge. The ward man was brought before the governor's court, found guilty of striking a patient, and was relieved from extra duty at once and fined 15 days' labor without pay.

This ward man was also a Spanish War soldier, who was under treatment for tuberculosis, but had recovered sufficiently so that he was able to take a position as ward man.

The statement that the governor flatly refused to allow other members to leave the sanitarium to testify in the trial is absolutely false. The patient in question asked the governor if the female nurse and the ward men on duty at the tuberculosis cottage might go down and testify at the trial. The governor stated that there would be no objection to this, providing it could be arranged so that these employees would not be detained from their work long enough for their work to suffer as a consequence. These employees were not subpœnaed at all.

The statement that the governor brought his influence to bear upon the prosecuting attorney, with the result that he refused to go on with the case, was also basely false. The prosecuting attorney asked the governor if he had any objection to the case being tried in the city court in Hot Springs. He was told that the governor had absolutely no jurisdiction over the action of the city court, and that he therefore had nothing whatever to say in regard to the matter, and had no objection to the case being tried by the prosecuting attorney.

Very respectfully,

JAMES A. MATTISON,
Governor and Surgeon.

Mr. Chairman, I have mentioned what one citizen of Hot Springs wrote me with reference to the charges against the management of the sanitarium, and will say that from the other citizen to whom I wrote I received a reply, in which he states that from his knowledge of the facts he is of the opinion that there was nothing else to do under the circumstances but to drop the three members in question from the rolls, but he goes on to deplore that there is no place where such unfortunates who may be so constituted mentally, or may be afflicted with intemperate habits that may make them irresponsible at times, may be cared for. He mentions that the institution being a sanitarium where there are diseased persons, many of them afflicted with tuberculosis, that it is necessary to keep them quiet, and that members who insist upon creating disturbances have to be expelled from the home, as there is no other alternative. He further expresses the opinion that there ought to be some provision by which such men could be segregated and cared for, and that at least when they are expelled there ought to be available funds to pay to have them transported to the place from which they came, and not allow them to remain a charge upon the locality where the institution is located.

I want to quote one statement from this gentleman's letter referring directly to the three men dropped from the rolls, as follows:

> These men have, no doubt, made trouble for six months or more. They are bright men, not drinking men or men of bad habits in any way; they have studied the Blue Book, the Red Book, and the large printed report of the congressional committee investigating the Sawtelle National Home, in California, a short time ago, hence their dissatisfaction and complaint.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I want to say, speaking for myself, that I am always in favor of the most thorough investigation of any charges that reflect upon the conduct of public officials, and that, so far as I am concerned, I would welcome an investigation of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, and I believe the board of managers and the officials of that institution would not object to an investigation. I would be satisfied if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] should be selected as a member of the committee to make the investigation. If the charges he has brought to the attention of the House are true, the sooner it is known and the sooner the conditions in that institution are corrected the better it will be for all. No one will defend such a condition of affairs as that. On the other hand, if the charges are untrue and without foundation, those upon whom they reflect should be exonerated.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that men who have enjoyed many years of a successful career in any walk of life, and who have established and built up reputations, ought not to be assailed by charges brought to the attention of this House based upon statements that come from sources that may not be responsible and without opportunity of verifying the truth or falsity of the charges. I therefore believe that Members should be more careful about accepting charges reflecting upon public officials, until they have made sufficient inquiry to be convinced that they are true. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the civil-service retirement before I proceed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of civil-service retirement. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this morning, when the debate was begun on the sundry civil bill, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] took occasion to pronounce his judgment upon my suggestion that I voted against dispensing with District day in order to expedite the consideration of the Crosser bill. Well, that incident has passed and amounts to nothing one way or the other, but I am glad to have had that opportunity to cast a vote which, if the majority had voted likewise, would have expedited the consideration of the Crosser bill. I consider that the Crosser bill for the taking over of these street railway lines in the District of Columbia important enough to demand just as speedy consideration as possible. It is true that the bill has not been reported formally by the Member who is charged with the responsibility of reporting it, but the House has seen by the action of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] on behalf of the bill that he is interested in that there are matters reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia that have to be considered or that circumstances will require that they be considered before this bill can come up; and to-day, if we had devoted our time to the consideration of the bill of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] and others that have been reported instead of to these roll calls, there would have been no trouble in taking up the Crosser bill on next District day.

The newspapers of the District who are opposing the Crosser bill are especially impressing upon the minds of the Members who may read their comments the fact that there are other matters before the committee, and that those matters ought to be taken up first. "The Crosser Bill to Lag" is one heading. And every suggestion that can be made to impress the idea of delay on that particular bill, because of the lateness of the session, is suggested in these papers. We ought not to permit any delay on the bill. We ought, in the District of Columbia, to own these lines and operate them in the name of the Federal Government.

The city of Toronto has a population of 410,036 people. Its street railways pay a rent for the use of the streets of $2,437 a day, and grant a 4-cent fare during rush hours of the day. The city of Detroit, with a population of 465,766, has a 4-cent fare, and after the revenue has exceeded $3,000,000 the city gets a fifth of the gross receipts. The city of Chicago, with a population of 2,285,283, recently received an annual rent of $2,500,000 from the street railroads. Chicago receives 55 per cent of the net receipts of the railroads. Last year they received $695,000 more than they received the year before.

Here in the city of Washington we have two lines. We do not have the benefit of a universal transfer. We have less advantages than are granted in most of the cities of the country, while we have unlimited funds. It is not like in the ordinary cities of the country where there is trouble about financing the problem. We have the Federal Government back of us, have no trouble about raising the necessary money to buy the lines and operate them, and yet we permit them to be operated in a way such as to deprive us of the ordinary privileges of other cities and at an expense that is unjust and under conditions, as I have said, that are wrong.

So I was glad enough this morning of an opportunity to boost the Crosser bill. Mr. CROSSER came here from Cleveland, from under the inspiration of Tom Johnson and his experiences there, and there is no reason in the world why we can not handle these lines here, why we can not enact this measure, why we can not establish our own plant out here at Great Falls, and operate the roads without a cent of profit, and operate them under the management of Government departments, with a universal transfer and a 3-cent fare.

I do not know whether there was some kind of a sting about that bill or not that caused the gentleman to attempt to demonstrate some kind of lack of information on our part, but there was no lack of information. The fact is that the bill has been ordered reported by the committee, and the quicker we consider the other bills that are going to be urged in advance of the street railway bill the quicker we will have the street railway bill up for consideration. And when we do we will have instituted a doctrine of Government ownership not only in the Territory of Alaska, but we will also have instituted it in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize to a large extent with the expression just made by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN]. The Crosser bill is a long step in advance and because it is a long step in advance it is going to have hard sledding in the Congress of the United States. For one, I can foresee that a condition of public ownership of a utility like the street railway will be of great benefit to the people in this District. I can foresee a condition in the city of Washington where we will have summer cars in summer and winter cars in winter, and enough of them, where we can have a lower flat rate per passenger than we have to-day, and where we can have, like they have in some other cities, a low rate for the department people and for school children during periods in the morning and in the evening. I can also foresee a condition in this city where there would be to the benefit of all the people the privilege of universal transfer. But I can not foresee any such advantage to the people of this District without a fight in the American Congress and a bitter fight against those who seem to stand in fear of or in sympathy with the great interests. Now, the sooner we get at that fight the better. The preliminary battle has been won in committee by a majority of one. That bill will be reported out to the House, and the sooner we clear other District matters away the sooner we can get at the proposition where the public shall own these railroads.

However, I did not arise to talk about the Crosser bill. I voted "nay" this morning against the House going into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the sundry civil bill. I voted with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] to defeat that motion, knowing that if we did defeat it then we could take up District bills. And I was particularly anxious to get to one District bill, the one introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] to improve the conditions under which laboring men work in the building trades. Labor comes with great difficulty to its rights in this House. We have two days in the month for the consideration of District business. The last District day was set aside by a special rule. That business has passed. We had this morning arrived legitimately at a District day. The District was entitled to this day.

The motion was made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to supersede the District Committee. The question was up to the membership of this House to consider the sundry civil bill in the desultory general debate that we are now having, with the point of no quorum coming every few minutes, or to consider the Buchanan bill for the benefit of labor in the building trades. And the House by a majority vote went into this general debate, with its constant interruptions in the shape of long, tiresome roll calls, and passed up the consideration of a measure of moment.

Now, this measure which Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois has introduced and which was reported, by the way, 30 days ago, is unquestionably of benefit to labor. It is entitled, "A bill amending the building regulations of the District of Columbia by providing for the better protection of persons engaged in and about the construction, repairing, alterations, or removal of buildings, bridges, viaducts, and other structures." Now, what does the bill do? It provides in terms specifically for all manner of safety devices in the building trades; for instance, safety rails on scaffolds, for a factor of safety on scaffolding, providing, in that connection, that the scaffolding or device shall be so constructed as to bear four times the maximum weight required to be dependent thereon or placed thereon when in use.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like three or four minutes more.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. It provides that whenever any workman or mechanic discovers any defect in a scaffold or hoist, or other building device, that that workman may notify the building inspector of the defect, and the building inspector shall thereupon serve notice upon the contractor for the correction of that defect. Then if the contractor takes no notice of the inspector's warning, it provides for punishment. The measure also makes provision for safety to workmen against overloaded floors, one of the causes of frequent accidents in the building trades. It also makes provision for a correct system of communication in hoists between the man who runs the engine and the elevator which is run by the engine and those in charge of the elevator. It prohibits the use of freight lifts and elevators for passenger service in the erection of buildings. It provides for the protection, by planking, of floors beneath that floor where the construction is in progress.

Now, I should think, Mr. Chairman, that these provisions would appeal to every individual in the House of Representatives. It is only a week ago, I am told, that a man lost his life in Washington who would not have lost it if this measure had been a law. It is within the recollection of almost every man here that in the construction of the great building at Fifteenth and H Streets two men lost their lives in one day by reason of the failure of the contractors to adopt such safety devices as are provided for in this bill.

I am told that this bill, which the House refused to consider this morning, is framed and adopted from a like measure which has become a law in Illinois. I am told that in the year 1906, the year previous to the adoption of that statute in Illinois, out of a membership of some 1,100 among the structural iron workers in Chicago 29 were killed and 116 injured. I am told that it can be proved—and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] has the figures—that since the adoption of that statute in Illinois the casualty list has been materially reduced.

Now, my point to the House is this: Compared with a great appropriation bill which carries $107,000,000 this bill may seem to some of comparatively small importance; but the truth is that this bill is of major importance. The bills that we pass here for the District of Columbia become, in a measure, models for the whole country, and we ought not to pass by for general debate bills of this character.

I can conceive that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], anxious to get this great appropriation bill through before the 1st of July, is eager to force a consideration of that measure. But this morning the majority of the House turned down a measure of this merit for the general debate we have been having—general debate which consists largely of requests to extend remarks in the RECORD, of speeches made upon political subjects, with every few minutes an interruption in the form of a point of no quorum. The House ought to give the District of Columbia affairs their time. I doubt very much now, with the few days remaining in this session, whether this bill or the Crosser bill will reach consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it might be appropriate to point out some things that were overlooked by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] in his remarks. This House has been in session practically since a year ago last April, and there have been many days during which the bill to which the gentleman refers might have been considered. There did not seem to be any alarming anxiety on the part of the gentleman from Kansas or others interested in that bill to have it taken up until now, as the session is drawing to a close. Then, when one of the bills that is vital to the continuation of the Government is called before the House they show a sudden and peculiar interest in this bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MURDOCK. I do not know what the gentleman's position is on the Buchanan bill, but does he not think it would be better to consider a bill of this merit than to have the general debate that we have been trying to have against the point of no quorum? I ask the question in all fairness.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not. This bill carries $107,000,000, and it must become a law before the 1st of July in order that the orderly activities of the Government shall be carried on. It carries appropriations for the Bureau of Mines, which affect the safety of more men in some single congressional districts than can possibly be affected by the bill to which the gentleman refers. It provides an additional mine rescue car for the Bureau of Mines and money to replace completely the equipment on the existing cars. Of course that is of no importance to the gentleman from Kansas, because he overlooks the fact, or did not know, perhaps, that the appropriation is contained in the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not yield. This bill carries $2,500,000 to maintain the Life-Saving Service. It is not of importance to the gentleman from Kansas that the Life-Saving Service may be adequately provided for at the beginning of the fiscal year. It provides for the collection of customs duties. It provides $2,500,000 for the Public Health Service, to carry on investigations of vital importance to the laboring men, as well as to all other classes of citizens, and to prevent infectious and contagious diseases being brought into this country. It contains an item to build a hospital in the District of Columbia. It contains an item of over $3,500,000 for the Interstate Commerce Commission, $1,900,000 of which is for the physical valuation of railroads. It carries money for the United States Board of Mediation and Conciliation, to help adjust the controversies between capital and labor and to bring about that friendly cooperation between capital and labor that will be conducive to the happiness and prosperity of the laboring men. It carries $200,000 for the Commission on Industrial Relations, engaged in investigations designed primarily in the interest of the laboring people of the country.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at present. It carries many million dollars for necessary work in connection with the defenses of the country, for the national defense—things considered highly imperative and essential and for which the appropriations must be made. It carries $275,000 for artificial limbs for Union soldiers—these allowances are made under the law—and for trusses for disabled Union soldiers. It carries money for the support of the national soldiers' homes and for the State soldiers' homes, for the Lighthouse Service, for the Immigration Service, and for innumerable other activities of the Government, for which provision must be made.

The gentleman from Kansas asks if I do not think that the bill to which he refers should have been considered to-day instead of this general debate, interrupted by the point of no quorum. In the first place, the length of the general debate to which I was compelled to agree was due to some extent to the fact that the 17 followers of the gentleman from Kansas demanded one hour of general debate—practically as much time as will be consumed by the Democratic majority in this House upon this bill—and as those who understand——

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In a moment. Those who understand how things must be done in this House know that it would be a saving to yield to such demands than to take two rolls in fixing the time for general debate.

Now, the point of no quorum has been made continuously by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN], who is disappointed because his bill was not taken up and because of the motion submitted by me by direction of the committee which reported this bill. He served notice upon me while the vote was being taken that he would endeavor to have a week taken in disposing of the six hours of general debate. That is his notion, Mr. Chairman, of the manner in which to expedite this bill through the House, so that we may more speedily reach the bill which he claims to be interested in; and such conduct arouses some suspicion in my mind that gentlemen perhaps are not so anxious to have their bill considered as they are to get the advertising that comes from this sort of agitation.

If the Members of the House do not wish the time to be wasted by calling the roll to ascertain a quorum, let 100 of them remain here, so that a quorum will be present, and the House can transact its business properly.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. This bill that you are now considering——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield for a question, and for nothing else.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The gentleman will not yield for a statement?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I will not. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-seven Members present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, when 230 Members answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to the House to be entered upon the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, when by the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] the point of no quorum was made, so that a quorum might be here to listen to me, I was explaining to the House the relative unimportance of the bill reported by the District Committee, as compared to the sundry civil appropriation bill, so far as matters in which the laboring people of the country were concerned. I had already mentioned the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] had threatened that if the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the sundry civil appropriation bill prevailed he would undertake to see that as much time was taken in this six hours' general debate as a man with that parliamentary skill and resourcefulness which enable him to make the point of no quorum from time to time could effect. The gentleman seems to forget that it is no punishment to me to drag out the time taken in general debate on this bill. I must stay here until the bill is ended. Many other Members of the House, having been compelled to remain here continuously for some time during the consideration of the so-called antitrust bills, were hopeful that during the time occupied by general debate they might properly go to their offices to clean up accumulated work; but the gentleman from Illinois seems to believe that I am being punished in some way for some imaginary breach, and because of that fact he seems determined to punish the membership of the House generally by compelling them to remain here to listen to speeches which they do not desire to listen to while the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] from time to time goes out and refreshes himself on the balcony outside of the House lobby.

Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I shall neither be coerced nor frightened nor driven off from what I conceive to be my duty to the House by this idle process of insisting that Members be compelled to remain here to listen to speeches against their will. The House can determine for itself whether it proposes that any one individual can fritter away public time in this manner. If 100 Members will remain here, then he is deprived of the sole weapon at his command.

I was somewhat amused by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] complaining against time being given for general debate. He was one of those supposed patriots who have strutted around in previous Congresses insisting that every Member of the House should be given the absolute right to voice the sentiments of his people on every occasion and at every opportunity; and because we consented to set aside six hours to-day during which some Members who believed that they had some message of real value either to the House, to the country, or to their respective constituencies might be given the opportunity to deliver it, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] talks about "this ridiculous waste of time in general debate."

Mr. MURDOCK. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In a moment. I notice that no one ever deems ridiculous the time for general debate unless he does not intend to speak himself.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield for a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would it not have been better economy of time for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] as chairman of the committee to have given up, say, an hour to the consideration of this Buchanan bill to-day, and then gone into his general debate? Would he not really have saved time and saved his own feelings in the matter?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; Mr. Chairman, nobody ever saved time here or anywhere else by being sandbagged into doing something that one individual wants and nobody else wants.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How could the gentleman from Kansas or anybody else say that the bill could be disposed of in one hour?

Mr. MURDOCK. Or a couple of hours at the most.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman permit me to finish what I have to say? I know how it pains the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. It does not pain me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But he need not sit here if he does not wish to listen to it. Any one Member of the House who was recognized by the Speaker could take an hour. I have seen attempts to do the business of the District Committee in an hour. I have seen how little progress has been made in the course of an entire day. This pending bill is the most important business before the House. How much will it avail the gentleman from Kansas if he should succeed in suspending the operation of the seven mine rescue cars of the Bureau of Mines because the bill that he believes is more important and should be taken up is not taken up?

This is not something that I want done. I am merely the mouthpiece of the committee preparing the bill carrying $107,000,000, which is essential for the proper conduct of the Government of the United States. Because one or two individuals of this House set themselves up as superior judges of what is best, because the overwhelming majority of the House disagree with them as to the particular business that should be done at a particular time, then they do the "dog-in-the-manger" act and say "if we can not have our way, we will try to prevent the majority of the House doing business." It is for the majority of the House to determine that question.

I have no more interest in the passage of this bill than anyone else. The bill is prepared and reported to the House, taken up in an orderly manner in accordance with the rules of the House. I am convinced that the great majority of the House proposes that it shall take up its business in an orderly manner and in the manner that the great majority desires. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, expressing the hope that a sufficient number of Members will remain here to proceed without unnecessary waste of time by repeated roll calls. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the application of the Underwood tariff bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ROBERTS].

Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada. Mr. Chairman, so wide has the range of debate taken in this House during the past few weeks, and so much done to promote harmony among the various factions, that I feel inclined at this time to pour some oil upon the troubled waters in the hope that what I say will be received by my friends across the aisle in the spirit in which it is given, and that the little differences existing among the warring elements will be entirely forgotten and the remaining days of this session will be in keeping and perfect unison with the tenets of the opposition.

We had a general election in this country in 1912. Most of us remember it. There were three great presidential condidates, Mr. Taft, Mr. Roosevelt, and Mr. Wilson. [Applause.] Mr. Taft was defeated and went back to school. Mr. Roosevelt was defeated, went fishing, and brought back a river to prove it. [Laughter.] Mr. Wilson was elected and—well, that is another story. At last account Mr. Taft was still alive and doing well, Mr. Roosevelt was still alive and "doing" Europe, and Mr. Wilson was still alive, but doing poorly—he also will go back to school at the opening of the spring term in 1917.

I am an optimist and believe that all the Members on this side will be together in one great party, under the same banner, fighting for the same principles, and will sweep the country in 1916. Two parties, even though traveling around the earth and moving in opposite directions, with the same lofty ideals in view, will each get back to the original starting point, somehow, some time. The preliminary exodus on that side of the House has already begun and will be practically completed at the coming election. Those Members who stood for the Underwood tariff schedules and the doctrine of free trade, and who stand for and defend the administration's weak-kneed, wobbly foreign policy, will have some explaining to do when they go back home.

The Baltimore convention nominated for the Presidency a great man and a good man, and one worthy of the respect and admiration of his countrymen; a man certain to be elected under the existing circumstances. It would have been the same with any man whose name was presented for the Presidency in that convention. Several great leaders' names were presented for consideration, but for the good of the country in general, and the Republican Party in particular, the one least capable of remaining long in power was selected—selected by virtue of catalysis at the opportune moment.

Had the convention nominated the real choice of the American people, it would have nominated and elected that great, honest Democratic Speaker of this House, the gentleman from Missouri, Hon. CHAMP CLARK. [Applause.] His foreign policies would have so pleased the American people that, regardless of the administration's faulty, free-trade tariff policy, he would have been a much harder man to dislodge in 1916.

The American people are sick and tired of our present so-called "watchful-waiting" foreign policy and are anxious to go to the polls and put into office a good, strong man who believes in maintaining and preserving for all time inviolate the true principles and established traditions of our Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And now that the present session is slowly drawing to a close, it is but meet and proper that some consideration should be given to devising ways and means by which the majority in this House might successfully get together and agree upon a campaign program for the coming election. The country within the last 15 months has reached such a level of business depression as has not been witnessed since the former idol of Democracy, Mr. Cleveland, and a Democratic Congress ran the ship of state upon the rocks.

It might be well to have another investigating committee appointed. I introduced a resolution in this House during the Sixty-second Congress which I thought would perhaps be the last investigating committee needed during the present administration. It was a resolution calling for an investigation of investigators. [Laughter.] It still sleeps the sleep that knows no waking. It might suffice and be more appropriate to create a board of mediators to be known, for the lack of other unused terms, "the X Y Z mediators," whose duty it will be to promulgate the true principles of Democracy and harmonize the differences and misunderstandings existing among the various factions in the opposition ranks.

In passing it might be well for the mediators to harmonize the two great Memorial Day addresses delivered at Arlington on Memorial Day, together with all the incidents connected therewith, or in any manner related thereto, one by the President of the United States and the other by the Speaker of this House, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, and in order to assist as much as possible I desire to insert in my remarks a brief comparison of the salient points of each side by side as they appeared in the Washington Post of May 31 last:

WAR STILL THE CHIEF END OF CIVILIZATION, SAYS CLARK.

It is written, "Blessed are the peacemakers," but after 19 centuries of Christian endeavor * * * we are prone to smite the smiter.

* * * * *

The day has not yet arrived when swords are beaten into plowshares or spears into pruning hooks; and, judging from facts which can be neither blinked nor denied, that era of perfect peace is out of sight in the distant future.

* * * * *

If history is to be believed, war has been the most important occupation of man since Cain slew Abel and since Tubal Cain first worked in a blacksmith shop. The corporation of captains from Nimrod to Gen. Wood occupy more space in the annals of mankind than do all the statesmen, philosophers, poets, preachers, writers, and artisans that ever lived.

* * * * *

All history is but one unending story of human butchery. All our boasted and multiplied acts of civilization are but preparations for the sacrifice of war—the festival of death.

PEACE IS THE KEYNOTE OF THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

I can never speak in praise of war, ladies and gentlemen; you would not desire me to do so. But there is this peculiar distinction belonging to the soldier, that he goes into an enterprise out of which he himself can not get anything at all.

* * * * *

There are battles which are just as hard to go into and just as hard to stay in as the battles of arms; and if the man will but stay and think never of himself, there will come a time of grateful recollection, when men will speak of him not only with admiration but with affection and with reverence.

* * * * *

That is their achievement, unequaled anywhere else in the annals of mankind, that the very men whom they overcame in battle join in praise and gratitude that the Union was saved.

* * * * *

This flag calls upon us daily for service, and the more quiet and self-denying the service the greater the glory of the flag. We are dedicated to freedom, and that freedom means the freedom of the human spirit.

I also desire to insert a clipping which appeared in the Washington Times on the same date, together with a Washington dispatch appearing in that Democratic newspaper, well known to this administration as well as others, the New York American:

PRESIDENT MAKES PEACE WITH GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

President Wilson made his peace to-day with the Grand Army veterans. Deciding at the last moment to reverse his decision not to attend the Memorial Day exercises at the Arlington National Cemetery, he not only attended but made an address.

In a speech devoted to a eulogy of the veterans and the part which they played in preserving the Union, he sought to salve the wound which his ill-timed refusal to participate in the exercises had opened.

It was a trying ordeal for all taking part in the ceremonies, for in the list of orators for the day were veterans who a few hours before had been planning to criticize the President for what they regarded as his slight of the Grand Army. All passed off, however, as though nothing had occurred to mar the preparation for the services.

GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC COOL TO WILSON—OVATION FOR CLARK—PRESIDENT AT LAST HOUR DECIDES TO ADDRESS VETERANS AT ARLINGTON AFTER SPEAKER OF HOUSE WAS ANNOUNCED AS ORATOR—FINAL ACTION TAKEN, SAYS WHITE HOUSE, TO AVOID "MISCONSTRUCTION"—MISSOURIAN PAYS FINE TRIBUTE TO SOLDIER HEROES.

WASHINGTON, May 30.

President Wilson, after declining to attend the Memorial Day ceremonies at Arlington National Cemetery to-day, suddenly changed his mind, following the announcement that Speaker CLARK had accepted an invitation to make the principal address in place of the President, and hurriedly put in an appearance.

At the cemetery Speaker CLARK was given a tremendous ovation. The President was received with unmistakable coolness. Perfunctory applause, which quickly became silent, followed the President's address.

It might also be well to attempt to harmonize the speeches of the Speaker of this House and the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee with the speeches of the more distinguished gentleman who presides over the destinies of this Republic, on the Panama tolls question. It will require some time, but it will be worth while, and for the benefit of all concerned I desire to insert in my remarks the following climax to that great speech delivered by the Speaker of this House:

Now may the God of our fathers, who nerved 3,000,000 backwoods Americans to fling their gage of battle into the face of the mightiest monarch in the world, who guided the hand of Jefferson in writing the charter of liberty, who sustained Washington and his ragged and starving army amid the awful horrors of Valley Forge, and who gave them complete victory on the blood-stained heights of Yorktown, may He lead Members to vote so as to prevent this stupendous folly—this unspeakable humiliation of the American Republic.

Of course the question of platform pledges, party promises and performances, and other questions such as back pedaling, mediating, hesitating, dictating, straddling, backbiting, double-crossing, double-dealing, dealing from the bottom, and so forth, should not be overlooked. A discussion of these subjects pro and con will tend to harmonize the party. Some attention should also be paid to the ethics of professional politicians in national conventions. [Laughter.]

I further respectfully submit as a side issue some attention be given to that much-mooted question the high cost of living under the Underwood tariff bill; and in order to arrive at a proper solution of the question it would be well for the mediators to subpœna as witnesses the people who voted the free-trade ticket at the last election.

The committee should also, while not otherwise engaged, call before them the laboring men and the business men of this country and explain to them fully wherein the Democratic tariff bill has resulted in bettering their conditions; and, further to unify and pacify the various malcontents in the opposition party, I suggest that at the conclusion of their hearings they have a good old-fashioned "hard-times party" in honor of the rank and file; that much care and forethought should be used in preparation for the event, which in some respects will resemble Belshazzar's feast with the wine left out and grape juice—imported—substituted in lieu thereof; that the decorations be our national colors on imported bunting intertwined with foreign-made flowers—artificial; that the table upon which the course is laid be made from lumber grown, hewed, and put together in Canada. There might be some men present interested in the lumber industry, and it will be a pleasure to them to have the entire banquet as nearly in keeping with the principles of free trade as possible. All fruits and vegetables should be plainly marked "Imported," and all meats used should be strictly of the Canadian-Australian or "A. B. C." brands, in honor of the sheep growers and cattlemen in attendance. Particular care should be used in marking the eggs with these letters, "Laid in China"; that the sugar cubes used be plainly marked "Importations," in honor of the guests who attend from cane and beet sugar growing sections of the country; that the linen, tablecloths, and napkins be marked "Made in Belfast"; that no cutlery be used except the prevailing imported grade direct from England or Germany—that will please "John Bull" especially. The subpœnas and invitations sent out should be printed on Canadian paper in honor of the printers and paper men who will attend. Some one might recite the following poem by Jack Wiley:

THE LIMIT.

Shall the flag be made in England?
  Kinder riles one up a bit;
Kinder starts the blood a bilin'
  Just to merely think of it.
Shall the flag we call "Old Glory"
  In a foreign land be made?
This is certainly the limit
  Of the foul work of free trade.
Shall the flag be made in England,
  Far away, across the deep?
Down with sentiment and feeling?
  Buy your bunting where it's cheap?
What care free-trade foes of country?
  They've no patriotic pride.
What's the flag but so much dry goods?
  Make it on the other side.
Shall the flag be made in England?
  Kinder riles one up a bit;
Kinder starts the blood a bilin'
  Just to merely think of it.
Work and wages they have taken,
  And in idleness men lag;
Taken industry to England;
  Now they want to take the flag.

As a further mark of respect to the feelings of the gentlemen from Louisiana in attendance, I suggest that, inasmuch as they lost out on the regional bank proposition and their chief industry has been destroyed, they be made waiters for the occasion, and that they be properly attired in suits the texture of which was grown in their own cotton fields, sold abroad, manufactured abroad, and sold back to them in the form of the finished product, the profits going to support foreign workingmen.

These suggestions are made in the best of faith and for no other purpose than promoting harmony in the ranks of the opposition. We on this side of the House realize the necessity for such a gathering and feel that you will adopt our suggestions and receive them in the proper spirit. It might be well for those who attend to provide themselves with a few silver dollars, as some Members of the party might speak who are accustomed to receiving Chautauqua prices; and, by the way, that reminds me that the Secretary of State is booked for the coming season. [Laughter.]

To doubly insure harmony I suggest that the premier and the honorable Speaker sit at opposite ends of the table, and that the President be not invited—he might refuse. A seat should be provided for him, however, as he might reconsider and conclude to attend. It might also be well for the distinguished gentleman from Missouri to leave his "dawg" at home; and if the president of the American Federation of Labor is present, and his secretary, and are called on for speeches, those in attendance will doubtless find out all about the question of compromise on section 7 in House bill 15657 and how the administration leaders and the Judiciary Committee back-pedaled, side-stepped, and straddled over that important provision. They might also call to the attention of those present the thousands and thousands of workingmen out of employment, but that is another question. The voting is over on the presidential question for a couple of years, and they will have plenty of time to quietly think the matter over. Of course the opposition party may justly claim the honor of giving more men, women, and children perpetual holidays in the same length of time than any other party in our history—they are all idle now, but have not the price to even purchase foreign-made "cheap John" firecrackers and punk for the occasion. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And as the banquet proceeds and the grape juice becomes red and giveth its color in the cup and moveth itself aright, some gentleman, for the sake of the country in general and the opposition party in particular, should suggest to those in attendance the urgent necessity of giving to the business men of this country a little breathing spell now and then, and an opportunity to go ahead and lawfully organize and do business according to the "Rules of Hoyle." Some one with the true interest of the country at heart might suggest that Congress adjourn forthwith and not convene again until March 4, A. D. 1917.

Of course, there will be no differences of opinion as to the administration's Mexican policy, as all will agree that Carranza, Huerta, and Villa, the "trifling trinity," have acquired through long years of plunder, rapine, and murder a prescriptive right to slaughter, ravish, and torture our own citizens in that country as well as those of other foreign Governments, and at this late date we have no right to interfere. Such a policy will get you votes.

Some Member should propose the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine as a dead letter and the adoption of some new-fangled Anglo-American alliance that will sound better and be more effective in preventing foreign countries from acquiring territory on the American Continents.

Let the new doctrine have a new name. Let it be in keeping with the great spirit of unrest which prevails and one which will tend to catch more votes and be more in keeping and consonance with your ideals of a new and up-to-date foreign-made policy. It will get you votes, and, after all, my dear friends, is not that what you are after? Come out strong on the administration's Panama tolls policy and the recent Colombian treaty; it will bring harmony in many congressional districts, and especially harmony in the various congressional districts of Missouri. But, then again, some of the people will "have to be shown," and in this connection let some aspirant for a presidential appointment as postmaster in New Jersey make himself solid with the administration by reading the following contribution to the New York American from the pen of John Temple Graves.

TOLLS AND MEXICO WORK PARTY RUIN.

[By John Temple Graves, in New York American.]

A great House Democrat told me to-day that his private and official reports were full of discouraging information from New York, from Indiana, from Ohio and Illinois, and from Louisiana.

A Wilson Senator of the inner circle and almost of the "kitchen cabinet" confessed to me to-day that the best he hoped for in November was to see the House remain Democratic by from 8 to 10 votes. Senator Vardaman yesterday prophesied, like a Democratic Jeremiah, the coming misfortunes of his party.

What is the matter with this triumphant Democracy of 1912? Why do the prophets upon the housetops cry the warnings of disaster near at hand? Why are the people discrediting it, and why are the leaders cast down?

What has happened, and who is to blame if that magnificent majority of 142 should fade and dwindle into 7 or 8? The Democrats have passed a tariff measure, it is true; but it is too early to condemn that measure yet, before it has been tried. The party has passed a currency bill, but the currency bill is just now going into practical experiment.

TOLLS AND FOREIGN POLICY.

Sifting the situation with fairness and care, it is logical to say that if the Democratic fortunes are fading and falling, it is due to tolls repeal and the foreign policy of the administration.

Mexico and Panama are the undoing of the Democratic administration.

The don't-know-what-to-do policy in Mexico and the weak and un-American surrender at Panama have alienated the people and demoralized the most magnificent fighting army of Democrats that the Capital has known for a quarter of a century.

Everybody in Washington says this now—in both parties and in all assemblies. Even Senators who have been both loyal and silent—and also obedient—are saying to-day what they would not have dared to say last week—that the administration has lost its hold.

Five of the most loyal have said to me with real impatience:

"There was no need to project this tolls question into a united and victorious Democratic Party. I protested against it at the time, and I see now that I was right. It was foolish and obstinate."

Only those who frequent those historic corridors at the Capitol can understand what a mighty change this kind of comment illustrates in Congress. And these men say that reports of disaffection reach them "from all over the country." There is no doubt of the fact that strong men and loyal men in the Democratic Party are sore and indignant.

While some aspiring candidate for a clerical position in the Department of Commerce might with propriety read the following editorial appearing in the Washington Post of Saturday's issue:

LOW-TARIFF RESULTS.

The more detailed figures on the imports and exports for March which have just been issued by the Department of Commerce give a rather puzzling aspect to the recent assurances of Secretary Redfield to the President that the foreign trade of the United States is improving.

There is little evidence of improvement in the crude materials for use in manufacture, which show an increase of $12,000,000 in imports and a decrease of $9,900,000 in exports, or in foodstuffs in crude condition and food animals, which show an increase of $4,400,000 in imports and a decrease of $6,680,000 in exports.

Evidently the trade balance is going steadily against us. There is no way to avoid this conclusion, and in the figures of the Department of Commerce is to be found the real psychology of the present situation which brought the complaint from the Illinois and Ohio business men.

Imports are constantly increasing all along the line, according to the official figures of the Department of Commerce. About the only exception is in manufactures for further use in manufacturing, which show a decrease of $1,900,000 in imports.

While the rise in imports in nearly every commodity is accompanied by a corresponding lowering of the export figures, this does not hold good with the manufactures for further use in manufacturing. That trade has fallen off largely because American manufacturers find no profit in completing the manufacture of the articles under the protective tariff. Not only are we failing to make contracts to complete the manufacture of the articles, but we are not manufacturing as many articles to be used as part of a manufactured product abroad. Under the single heading of "Manufactures for further use in manufacturing" our exports have fallen off no less than $5,100,000 in the single month of April, 1914, compared with the corresponding month of the previous year.

The situation may be wholly "psychological," but as the jump in imports and the drop in exports have been coincident with tariff revision the tariff will have to bear the brunt of the country's complaint when election time arrives.

Of course, the old question of personal liberty and State rights will be carefully thrashed out, and there might be some differences of opinion, but in that case harmony can be procured by an appeal to the distinguished leader at the other end of the Avenue, the party secret caucus, or by an appeal direct to the high court of rules—Henry's edition of rules and procedure governs. It is true that this procedure may not please all parties for and against the Hobson resolutions, the Bristow-Mondell amendment, or be entirely satisfactory to the delegates present from the Pacific coast States, who have an idea that they have the right to determine for themselves the propriety of close association in the public schools of their children with those of Asiatics. The people out there are about as pronounced on that subject and on the question of alien-land laws as some of the old-timers who will attend from that section of the country south of Mason and Dixon's line. Of course, the propriety of the administration sending the Secretary of State to Sacramento for the purpose of bringing about closer and more friendly relations with the Japanese on the farms and orchards and in the public schools will be judiciously handled. [Laughter.]

To further obliterate any sectional feeling that might arise some Member from the arid-land States might call the attention of the assemblage to the following timely article appearing in the Oregonian:

The West got what was to be expected when the House refused to consider the bill extending time of payment by settlers on reclamation tracts. The House is dominated by southern Democrats, who would gladly abolish the Reclamation Service and turn land-office receipts into the Treasury, in order that their pork bills may not cause a deficit. The West is being smitten with the jawbone of the Democratic ass.

The question of economy should be brought up and thoroughly gone into. It is one which will appeal to all of those who assemble and in the interest of the strictest economy the question of cutting down the salaries of all minor officials without a political pull should be carefully gone over. It might be suggested that inasmuch as the residents of the District of Columbia have no voice nor vote in national affairs and can not possibly make themselves felt from a political standpoint, that they be made to pay at least half of the running expenses of the entire National Government.

And it is to be hoped that like the guests of old at Belshazzar's feast they will drink "grape juice" and praise the gods of gold and of silver, of brass, or iron, or wood, and of stone, and that in the same hour there will come forth the fingers of a man's hand and write over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace and that the king will see the part of the hand that wrote "Mene, mene, tekel, u-pharsin," and that some Daniel will be brought forth and interpret the writing which was written, and that he will at least interpret that particular sentence "tekel," which means "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting."

Some wise man present might suggest that inasmuch as their days were numbered something should be done forthwith to get all there was coming, and that all hands dig deep into the pork barrel and that all possible means of evading the civil-service rules and regulations be forthwith devised and put into practice in the various departments of the Government; that all old and efficient members of the Grand Army of the Republic be demoted, placed in the poor farm, or relegated to the "scrap pile," and that they be displaced by political patriots, who fought, bled, and died upon the fields of partisanship, for surely their services are of far greater value and more in keeping with the true principles of the administration than long and honorable service in the preservation of the Union. Loud applause will doubtless follow any such timely and appropriate remarks, and if some gentleman present with an eye to the eternal fitness of things will only suggest that the occasion be concluded by pulling off one great Democratic, hesitating, side-stepping, back-pedaling ball, preceded by a grand march led by Gen. Coxey and Gen. Rosalie Jones, the Nation's two most democratic travelers, and a proper program is carried out, some real good may come to the opposition party, while all hands join in singing and dancing "Waltz me around again, Willie" and "We marched right in and we turned around and we marched right out again." [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] 30 minutes

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois). The Chair would like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is evidently no quorum present. Before this important question is further discussed—and it is important, as the gentleman from New York states—the Chair thinks that a quorum should be present to hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that the Chair can not, of his own motion, raise the point of no quorum while sitting in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the rule to the gentleman from Mississippi:

Whenever a Committee of the Whole House or of the Whole House on the state of the Union finds itself without a quorum, which shall consist of 100 Members, the Chairman shall cause the roll to be called, and thereupon the committee shall rise, and the Chairman shall report the names of the absentees to the House, which shall be entered on the Journal; but if on such call a quorum shall appear, the committee shall thereupon resume its sitting without further order of the House.

Will the gentleman from Mississippi state the ground of his point of order?

Mr. HARRISON. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Chair can not, by his own motion, raise the point of no quorum. The point of no quorum should come from one not in the chair. Of course, if the point of order is made, the Chair can entertain the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule does not state that any Member of the committee must make the point of order or call the attention of the Chair to it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question? What would be the remedy in this situation?—if every Member of the Committee of the Whole should disappear, what would the Chairman do?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think that could possibly happen, because I am sure that the gentleman from Kansas would always be here.

Mr. MURDOCK. But suppose it did disappear and only leave the Chairman present?

Mr. TAGGART. Then what would happen if the Chairman walked off?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-four Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; let us stay here and do business.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. The Chair has stated that there was not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not necessary to have a quorum for the committee to rise.

Mr. FOWLER. The Chair has announced that no quorum is present, and, according to the rules, the next thing is the calling of the roll.

Mr. GARNER. No; you can make a motion that the committee shall rise without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion for the committee to rise is always in order in Committee of the Whole House. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 22 ayes and 52 noes.

Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. MANN asked for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. GILLETT.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 73.

So the motion to rise was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). On this vote the tellers report ayes 26, noes 73, and with the Chair that makes 100 present—a quorum. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to preface my remarks by reading a short editorial from a magazine which enjoys the greatest reading clientele of any publication in the world. Any editorial utterance from this magazine is presented to the reading public only after thorough investigation of the matter under consideration. Its judgment is impartial and impersonal, and its editorial utterances are accepted by the American people as the result of conviction rather than as hastily prepared opinions that reflect the views of the advertising counter so often charged against some other publications.

I read a leading editorial from the Saturday Evening Post of June 6:

[From the Saturday Evening Post, Philadelphia, June 6, 1914.]

THE PEOPLE WANT TO KNOW.

Congress appropriates thirty-five or forty million dollars a year for improvement of rivers and harbors. The bills are passed on the time-honored pork-barrel plan. That the expenditures involve huge waste of public funds, and that a considerable part of them is nothing better than graft in an especially obnoxious form, is commonly believed.

If it were generally accepted that such misuse of money derived from the general public obtained in any other field—say, in the railroad field—Congress would immediately order an investigation. Congressman FREAR proposes in a concurrent resolution that the House shall order a thorough investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission of river and harbor expenditures. An investigation by a body independent of Congress would be better, but the Interstate Commerce Commission is acceptable.

We feel warranted in assuring Congress that the public would like to know approximately how much of the hundred and fifty millions or upward that has been spent on river and harbor improvement in the last five years has resulted in any tangible public benefit, approximately how much has been wasted, and about how much represents a form of political graft.

We say this without prejudice. A great part of the expenditure may have been quite justified by tangible public benefits resulting from it. The waste may be inconsiderable. But people generally believe that an important portion of the hundred and fifty millions or upward is just a tapping of the public till for the political benefit of individual Congressmen.

Surely that circumstance requires an authoritative investigation. Congress commands extensive resources for investigating. Let it employ them in this case at home.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Not at this time. I shall be pleased to do so later. Before commenting upon this editorial, which has a relation to the bill here under discussion, I desire to make a suggestion regarding the Post's understanding of the amount of appropriations for rivers and harbors.

As nearly as can be ascertained, for 1914 the appropriations are as follows:

House appropriation, river and harbor bill	$43,289,004
House appropriation, sundry civil	6,990,000
Senate appropriation, increase estimated	6,000,000
Total, 1914, cash appropriations	56,279,004
New House projects adopted	32,897,871
New Senate projects adopted	6,000,000
Total, 1914, cash and new projects	95,176,875

In the foregoing table estimated Senate increases are taken from press reports.

For the last four years the total cash appropriations appear as follows:

1911	$49,380,541.50
1912	40,559,620.50
1913	51,115,889.00
1914	56,279,004.00
Four years, cash	197,335,055.00
New projects, 1914	38,897,871.00
Total	236,232,926.00

This astounding sum does not include projects adopted prior to 1914, which amount to approximately $273,000,000 in existing Government obligations.

The 1913 report of the Chief of Engineers, page 30, shows total river and harbor appropriations to have been $789,288,614.45 for all purposes, to which should be added the 1914 appropriations above itemized in order to ascertain the full amount appropriated. It is difficult to learn from the reports the exact proportion of this vast amount which has been poured into the rivers of the country, but after expending over three-quarters of a billion dollars we now discover that during this period the commerce on the rivers of the country has decreased approximately 80 per cent.

To this tremendous sum of $789,288,614.45 in past appropriations is now to be added in the year 1914, for present and future payment obligations, $95,176,875, or a total of $884,465,489. Again, to this sum should be added $273,000,000 in projects heretofore adopted and begun; also $92,500,000 for projects heretofore adopted but for which no appropriations have yet been made; also 120 additional surveys in the 1914 bill, entailing unknown future expenditures.

And the balance sheet shows a loss of 80 per cent in river navigation, according to Government statistics which I have heretofore submitted to the House.

Mr. Chairman, I hasten to do justice where justice is due, and I have read the Post editorial to the House in order to make full atonement for a suggestion made by me in a speech of June 2 in the House, which was printed on the following day. However humble his place in this body, every Member of Congress occupies a responsible position toward the country at large. Sometimes we speak our convictions to a handful of Members occupying these seats. When our remarks are revised and inserted in the RECORD, we find them embalmed for all time, rarely attracting the attention of the public at large. The country is too busy to concern itself over speeches of individual Members, unless, forsooth, they reflect the policy of a political administration or have some special significance.

On the contrary, great newspapers and great magazines speak to hundreds of thousands of readers every week. The editorial utterance of a strong publication like the Chicago Tribune, with a daily circulation of more than a quarter of a million readers, becomes the standard for those people who believe in the good work which the Tribune has performed through the Mulhall investigation and other matters of great public interest which involve legislative morals; and I speak of the Tribune only as a leading member of a group of papers which is engaged in working for the public uplift.

Several magazines could be named, all of which have helped to raise the moral tone of business and of legislative performance. Such publications reach hundreds of thousands in every issue, and in the case of the Saturday Evening Post we have a publication which speaks to over 2,000,000 readers every week. Apart from flippant comments indulged in by different writers, and which do not always present a true picture of congressional action or of Members, these magazines have a powerful influence in shaping public sentiment—a sentiment which is rarely misdirected.

Mr. Chairman, in a recent number of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD appears an article written by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS]. It was first written for the Saturday Evening Post in an entertaining vein and dealt with what purported to be "The inside of the pork barrel." Thereafter an equally distinguished Senator secured its insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and it thereupon became a semiofficial utterance, which reflected upon the judgment of many Members who do not view the rivers and harbors pork barrel through the spectacles used by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Many of us believe the pork barrel is what it was once appropriately styled by a Senator at the other end of the Capitol, a "humbug and a steal," and believing, further, that its insertion in the RECORD challenged contradiction, on June 2 I hastily prepared a brief statement, which was given to the House as the truth concerning the pork barrel from my own viewpoint, and I attempted to point out some of the influences which are behind the barrel. During my remarks I expressed genuine disappointment over the failure of the Saturday Evening Post to declare its disapproval of the pork barrel and made a brief reference to the responsibility of great publications, possessed in common with Members of Congress, to present a true likeness of public conditions and of legislative measures.

It is very probable that those remarks did not reach the ears or attention of any considerable number of people, and the Post is not likely to be concerned with the judgment of any individual Member of the House. Yet I desire to publicly express my own appreciation and that of hundreds of thousands of the Post's readers for its fearless and well-timed demand that Congress investigate charges which have been repeatedly offered against the corrupt pork barrel.

In my remarks heretofore made on the subject I have quoted from Presidents of the United States, Senators, and leading publications throughout the country, all of whom by common agreement arrive at the same conclusion—that the river and harbor pork barrel is a "humbug and a steal," as it was fitly denominated by a distinguished Senator.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Not at this time; I will do so later. Editorially the Saturday Evening Post demands an investigation, the Chicago Tribune demands an investigation, the Washington Times said, in effect, the facts developed were astounding and justify an investigation. Scores of papers and other publications are becoming aroused to the iniquity of the pork barrel. The bill is not in the House at this time. It has gone to the Senate; but if it is returned to this body we are assured a dozen millions more will have been added to its $76,000,000 for present and future projects. That was the sum total of obligations which the bill carried when it passed the House. Added to that amount will be approximately a dozen millions more before the bill is returned to us, which will bring its total up to $88,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, the story is still incomplete. In the bill before us—the sundry civil appropriation bill—there has been added about $7,000,000 more for river and harbor improvements. In other words, approximately $100,000,000 may be covered by these two bills for the 1914 pork barrel, the greatest barrel ever foisted on the American people, worse than any of its predecessors and so filled with vicious, objectionable items that I can not believe the President will ever permit the measure to become a law.

In the sundry civil bill before us $4,176,000 is appropriated for the notorious $64,000,000 Ohio River Canal venture. Five million dollars has already been appropriated this year for the Ohio River Canal, making a total of $9,176,000 for this one canal for 1914. When President Cleveland vetoed the $14,000,000 river and harbor bill in 1896 he condemned that bill because of its present and continuing obligations. Private projects paid for by the Government were as objectionable to him as future obligations that smacked of pork-barrel methods. What would Cleveland say to the 1914 appropriations, which reach about $100,000,000, including scores of private and vicious projects, as pointed out in my speech of March 26? Many Members, through the importunities of constituents, may plead for some particular project, whether it be the Kissimmee, which is dry eight months in the year and gets $47,000 for a real-estate project, or the Oklawaha, which gets three-quarters of a million to help out some orange growers and real-estate interests, or the Ohio River Canal, which gets more in 1914 than was given to the whole river and harbor proposition in any one year during the seven years from 1875 to 1881, inclusive, when actual river navigation existed.

What a commentary upon legislative methods, Mr. Chairman, that $9,176,000 is being poured into a useless canal on the Ohio during a single year, when, aside from coal, iron ore, and lumber, only 132,189 tons were shipped through the Louisville locks in 1906, whereas shipments by the open river, for which other appropriations are made in 1914, reached many times the shipments by the canal. For illustration, the total 1905 traffic on the Ohio River—open river and canal—according to the report of the Commissioner of Corporations, amounted to 13,163,656 tons. In 1906 it had fallen to 11,427,784, and in 1912, according to the authority quoted in my remarks on March 26, the traffic had fallen to 8,618,396 tons. Of the 1906 traffic, the latest data available, only 1,343,904 tons out of a total of 11,427,784, or about 10 per cent of the total river traffic, went by way of the canal, and of this small proportion of total canal traffic, 1,211,715 tons was heavy freight, including coal, timber, and so forth, which could have gone by the open river, as it has always gone during the past century. In other words, 99 per cent of the total river traffic went by the open river, or was, properly speaking, open-river commerce.

These statistics I have taken from the best available Government reports, and they disclose that the Government is to pay out $64,000,000 for about 1 per cent of the river traffic known as high-grade freight, and of this $64,000,000, $9,176,000 is sunk in the Ohio Canal through the 1914 appropriations to be made by Congress. Figure out the cost to the Government per ton on a rapidly diminishing commerce and ascertain, if you can, how many dollars per ton are to be paid for the high-class traffic which we are trying to force through the canal. Rather than make such wasteful appropriations the Government could better afford to pay all freight bills for a century to come for every ton to be shipped by rail along the river which will ever be carried by the river and canal combined, because most of the shipments are for short distances, according to engineers' reports, and the canal will be a worthless and discarded venture long before the work on it is ever completed.

Mr. Chairman, the Mississippi has been plastered over with $144,000,000, which would have built a parallel railway on both sides of the river from Minneapolis to the river's mouth, yet during the last three decades this great river has lost over four-fifths of all its traffic. Notwithstanding ocean commerce has grown inversely and railway traffic has many times doubled within the same period to meet the demands of a population which has increased over 80 per cent, the Mississippi and the Missouri and countless other streams and rivulets covered by the 1914 appropriations have lost their commerce or never had any or never will.

Based on the statistics quoted by me to the House on a former occasion, we find the Ohio River traffic dropped from 13,163,656 tons in 1905 to 8,618,396 tons in 1912. I do not vouch for the last figures, because they were volunteered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], a supporter of the bill; but if they are reliable, they disclose a loss of over 33 per cent in Ohio River traffic in seven years. At the same proportionate rate the Ohio River traffic will have decreased as rapidly as that of the Mississippi before 20 more years pass by, and long before the $64,000,000 canalization project is finished the Ohio River Canal will follow the fate of other canals, over one-half of which, according to Government statistics, have been abandoned and result in approximately 2,500 miles of deserted, muddy, valueless ditches—a lasting monument to the grim, relentless progress of railway traffic.

In the 1914 appropriations two rivers, the Mississippi and the Ohio, get out of the Government Treasury $9,500,000 and $9,176,000, respectively, about one-third of the entire $56,279,000 cash appropriation for 1914. For what purpose? Where is the traffic? What a wild, reckless waste of $18,676,000! And all the commerce on the entire 4,000 miles of these two great streams does not approach in volume the annual 29,000,000-ton commerce of the Duluth-Superior Harbor, on the north border of my own State. Nor does the $18,676,000 of wasted millions in those two rivers include millions of dollars frittered away in 1914 in macadamizing with gold the bottom of the boatless, muddy Missouri; nor $72,000 used for the mysterious Mattewan fertilizing factory projects; nor $33,800 for scooping out the shallow Scuppernong; nor $47,000 for flushing Florida's famous dry-run real-estate project, the osculatory Kissimmee; nor $750,000 of Government money pulled out of the Treasury by the only original Oklawaha money octopus; nor over $6,000,000 of Government gold dumped into the crooked Coosa River cataracts, $65,000 of which is appropriated in 1914; nor does it include many millions of dollars more which I have before pointed out to the House are wasted in the 1914 bill by being dumped into a hundred other unnavigable streams, devoid of commerce, that can not be lured back from the railways with all the wealth possessed by the Government Treasury.

The Ohio River traffic is diminishing, excepting that the open river carries a small proportion of bulky, heavy commerce in competition with railways. The Mississippi, after an expenditure of $144,000,000, and the Missouri River, after a $13,000,000 expenditure, show a traffic decrease of over 80 per cent within the past 20 years.

Mr. Chairman, there are many worthy harbor projects which deserve fair treatment at the hands of the Government, but river improvements have been so recklessly and improvidently made that constituencies have come to look upon the river and harbor bill as a legitimate graft to be extended to them by Congress. I firmly believe the fault lies primarily with the constituent who forces his representative to espouse a project that is frequently vicious and bad. Nor do I seek to avoid the responsibility that comes to every one of us and which can not longer be ignored when we vote for such pork-barrel bills.

The sundry civil bill carries about $7,000,000 for rivers and harbors, in addition to the $88,000,000 now reported from the Senate side. It carries over $4,000,000 for the Ohio River Canal, in addition to the $5,000,000 already appropriated this year for the same purpose by the regular pork-barrel bill. I realize the sundry civil bill carries many needed appropriations; that it will be impossible to pry loose from the bill a single vicious pork-barrel appropriation; but I believe we owe it to ourselves and to the country to take warning from the demands that have come to us from high publicity sources. I do not believe this bill should pass when loaded down with these objectionable items. If it does pass, the Democracy of the country should revise its utterance contained in the 1912 platform, when it said:

> We call the attention of the patriotic citizens of our country to the record of economy and constructive legislation of the Democratic House of Representatives.

What was intended by the platform declaration at Baltimore?—

> We denounce the profligate waste of money wrung from the people by oppressive taxation through the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses.

You got into power by such promises of economy, and the people believed you when you said:

> We demand a return to that simplicity and economy which benefits a democratic government.

How can that utterance be justified when viewed in the shadow of the 1914 river and harbor pork barrel of nearly $100,000,000?

I have voted with you gentlemen across the aisle when, in my judgment, measures have been presented in which the good overcame the bad. I do not believe politics should determine our action on measures which affect the welfare of the people; but I can not understand how any man, be he Democrat, Republican, or Progressive, can justify a wasteful $100,000,000 pork barrel which places a burden of one dollar on every man, woman, and child in the country. I believe the vicious measure will never get through the Senate, nor do I believe President Wilson could be induced to sign it if it ever comes before him.

If the rivers and harbors and sundry civil bills of 1914 become laws with these objectionable items included, they will be an indictment against this Congress and this administration, a specter which, like Banquo's ghost, will not down in the minds of the people whose money is being squandered.

Mr. Chairman, I shall hereafter endeavor to do what I conceive to be my duty in regard to a few of the most vicious items contained in the bill before us. However ineffective my efforts may be, I feel sure that an indignant people will soon demand an early investigation of facts, which can not longer be ignored, which strike at the roots of honest methods of legislation and which are destructive to the confidence reposed in us by the people.

In my remarks of June 2 I inserted two strikingly strong editorials from great metropolitan dailies in each of which is demanded an investigation before more money is squandered on worthless river projects. I do not desire to insert clippings of a general character, but will say that editorials which I have received, coming from papers from all sections of the country, unanimously condemn the 1914 pork barrel and join in with the Saturday Evening Post's demand that an investigation be had as to present methods of preparing and passing rivers and harbors legislation.

Mr. Chairman, I will be very glad now to yield to any gentleman who wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman think that some of these river projects might be made to pay if the Interstate Commerce Commission can be induced to raise railroad rates high enough?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from New York, if the House is interested in that particular proposition, that I received word from one connected with the Interstate Commerce Commission, who suggests that when by navigation we are able to reduce the freight rates on any particular river, as was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] when this point was first made during the discussion of the river and harbor bill—when you do that and permit the railroads to make rates lower than the boats can make, so as to drive traffic off the rivers, you ought also to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix minimum rates, for only by so doing can you preserve river commerce. But the commerce has been driven from off the rivers not to return, unless through different methods of navigation, and then only to a limited extent. I shall be very glad to yield for any further questions.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the point is dilatory, and I refer the Chair to volume 5, Hinds' Precedents, section 5730.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon the point raised by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has stated that the bill now under discussion carries matters of great importance, and therefore it seems to me that we should have at least a hundred Members present to listen to the discussion. He can not sustain his position that it is dilatory, because it is very evident that there is no quorum present, and therefore the point of order must certainly be without ground.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] concluded?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It does not seem to me that making the point of order that there is no quorum present, when it is manifest that there is probably not a quorum present, can be called dilatory, especially as it takes no time to speak of to count and determine the presence or absence of a quorum. It is true that the point of order of no quorum was made half an hour or so ago, and it is also true that at that time there were 100 Members present. It is perfectly patent to the Chair and to everyone else that possibly, if not probably, some of those present have disappeared. Whether or not others have come in in the meantime, I do not know.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Three or four times during the afternoon this point of order has been made.

Mr. MANN. And it has been sustained every time, except once, so it could not have been dilatory.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And each time, on the roll being called, a large number of Members responded. In 1907 the same performance was indulged in on this same bill, and a very distinguished parliamentarian, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Watson, held that these repeated points of order made by one Member were evidently an attempt to obstruct the public business, and he thought it dilatory and declined to recognize the point. That decision is referred to in Hinds' Precedents, section 5730.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly patent, of course, if some Member should keep on making a point of no quorum when a quorum is present it would be apparent it was dilatory, because the Chair could not permit some one Member to stand on the floor and repeat every two seconds, "I make the point of order that there is no quorum present," and then declare a quorum here; but every time a point of no quorum has been made to-day it has been ascertained by the Chair after counting that there was no quorum present. Now, I do not think that the Chair can hold——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not; a few moments ago the Chair itself for the first time in the history of the Government called attention to the fact that, in his opinion, there was not a quorum present.

Mr. MANN. And made a count.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And upon a vote being taken immediately it was ascertained that a quorum was present. Now the same gentleman occupying a position on the floor, not quite so advantageous a one from which he could count, renews the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Illinois concluded?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word further in reply to the statement of the gentleman from New York that the gentleman who occupied the Chair found a quorum was absent, and after a count being made and orders and signals given we did get a quorum, I believe, after some hustling around and Members coming from other places, but it is, as usual, a misleading statement and an erroneous argument when the gentleman makes the statement that there was not an absence of a quorum at that time. Of course, probably if the gentleman had permitted a statement to-day in regard to the bill which should have been considered by this House to-day for the protection of life and limb of the building craftsmen in the District of Columbia, in order that lives might be saved, if that gentleman had made the same effort to give his support to it, it could probably have been considered and passed on in half an hour. The gentleman is proceeding in opposition to a measure for the protection of the wageworkers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman ought not to speak further out of order, because his statement is so inaccurate that it should not go in the RECORD.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is hearing the gentleman on the point of order, and the Chair would suggest that the gentleman is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I would like to suggest to the Chair the point of order was not being discussed in the remarks made before I made these remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees with the gentleman in that; but no one made the suggestion.

Mr. MANN. I am very sure I did not discuss anything but the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois did discuss the point of order, and he will excuse the Chair. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Of course the question of no quorum and the matter of its being dilatory is a delicate proposition. The Constitution requires that a quorum be present. The present occupant of the chair thinks that any Chairman should be very careful in passing upon the point of order that a point of no quorum is dilatory, but we have here this practical situation: It has not been half an hour since the presence of a quorum was developed by actual count in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. There has been no business whatever transacted since that time. The gentleman who occupied the floor—the Chair means business in the sense of a passage of a bill or a motion made——

Mr. MANN. There has been no motion made.

Mr. BARTLETT. There could not be any.

The CHAIRMAN. A gentleman was occupying the floor, who took the floor immediately after that and is at present occupying the floor except for this point of order, no business has been transacted, no motion has been made. The presence of a quorum was developed on the last count a very few moments ago, and the Chair feels that he is not infringing upon the rights of the country in holding that the motion is dilatory, and the Chair therefore sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to submit anything further?

Mr. FREAR. I only desire to yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped, owing to the lateness of the hour, that after the hot day we have experienced here to-day I might postpone until to-morrow what few words I desire to say upon this bill, but in order to expedite the business and to get through the bill as soon as possible I am willing to occupy the time this evening.

What I especially desired to call attention to at this time was the item in the sundry civil bill providing an appropriation for the Bureau of Mines, especially that part which refers to mine rescue work. In 1910 the Bureau of Mines was established and given certain power in the way of investigations for the safety of miners and the economic production of coal and other minerals throughout the country. At a later date the organic act was changed so as to enlarge the scope, powers, and duties of the Bureau of Mines, until to-day we have an act which we believe is sufficiently broad to provide a means of investigation along the lines of health and safety and economical development. The appropriation which is provided in this bill has been increased, I am pleased to say, to some extent, and among the items of increase is the one providing $30,000 for the purchase of new equipment in mine rescue work.

In going into the mines for the purpose of rescuing those who may be entombed there after an accident it is necessary that the apparatus should be first class and in good working condition. Three men who had been employed by the Bureau of Mines have lost their lives in doing rescue work after an explosion or a fire, or, I think, who have gone in the mine to determine whether or not it was safe for the miners to enter after a fire had occurred. And possibly you can recall the case in Pennsylvania, which is a recent one.

Mr. FARR. Is that in reference to the accident at Throop, in Pennsylvania?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; that was after a fire.

Mr. FARR. He was a constituent of mine.

Mr. FOSTER. This apparatus which the rescuers use ought to be in such a condition that the danger would be reduced to the minimum, because these men, when traveling into these mines after an explosion or for any other purpose where there is danger from poisonous gases, must depend entirely upon the air that they get through this breathing apparatus.

There has also been provided in this bill $25,000 for the work of the Bureau of Mines in investigations in petroleum production. It is ascertained that hundreds of thousands, yes, millions, of dollars' worth of natural gas is going out into the air, being burned or permitted to escape each year, without any useful purpose, and the Bureau of Mines has ascertained through experiments in the State of Oklahoma that this natural gas, this valuable fuel, can be preserved in the ground until it becomes necessary to use it, and then can be taken out without interfering with the production of oil. And in that one particular alone the Bureau of Mines has performed a wonderful work in the way of conservation.

Take it in California alone, where there is produced 100,000,000 barrels of oil each year. I do not know what it sells for there, but if the price is only 50 cents a barrel, it makes the production in California worth $50,000,000 annually. I think the Appropriations Committee has wisely provided this small amount in order that investigations may be carried on further in this important industry of our country.

In Oklahoma, which is the next largest oil-producing State in the Union, millions of barrels are produced each year; and if we are able to determine the best way of producing that oil, the best way of conserving the resources in that particular line, we have done a valuable service to that State and to the Nation. The State in which I live is the third largest oil-producing State we now have, and I know our people have for several years been concerned as to the importance of this valuable industry. I know also that hundreds of thousands of feet of gas escape each day in that field, which is wasted, forever gone, because when gas escapes, but is not burned for a useful purpose, it is of no benefit to the people and there is no source of revenue to those who own it. It is gone forever and can not be replaced.

The Committee on Appropriations, since the present chairman has held that important position, has been friendly to the Bureau of Mines, and the committee has provided each year some increase of appropriation; and yet I believe that we ought to, in the mine rescue work especially, have more revenue, and that these rescue cars, which are an important item of education to the miners of the country, might be in operation for 12 months in the year. As it is now, 6 to 9 months is about the time they can operate with the amount of appropriation provided. We have eight cars; seven of them could be kept in continuous operation. One could be kept to take the place of those that are out of commission for a certain time. What we need is that these rescue cars—not so much the rescue stations, because they are not the important part in the mine rescue work and the education of the miners—but these cars can be moved from mining camp to mining camp, where instructions may be given the miners in the proper rules for safeguarding the lives of miners and they may be instructed in first-aid work; where, in fact, they may teach them all the problems which a miner has to meet. And we know in many of these coal mines there are a number of foreigners, who do not speak our language and are unacquainted with our laws, and it is necessary, it is important, in order to save human life, that these men should be instructed so that they may understand the laws, the rules, the regulations, and all those things that are necessary to conserve human life in the mines.

Mr. BRYAN. In addition to the matter of instruction, motor cars are equipped to be immediately dispatched in case of accident, are they not?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRYAN. In case of alarm they go quickly to the scene?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir. It is estimated that at the present rate at which these cars can operate which the Government now owns it will require 12 years to go to all the mining camps in the United States and give sufficient instruction to these miners. And wherever they go the miners take great interest in this work. They are anxious to learn; they are anxious to know what they can do to make life safer where they are employed.

As the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] has just stated in reference to this work, I think it is an important thing that wherever there is a mining camp this instruction should be given in order that these men may know and may be taught what is necessary to be done to make mining safer. Operators in some cases are providing cars and apparatus in order that they may keep them where they may be necessary when an explosion occurs or when some other great accident takes place, and, as suggested by the gentleman from Washington, these cars should be placed in different parts of the country accessible to the mining regions, where they may be of service in case of explosions.

The Bureau of Mines has eight cars, distributed as follows: Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Huntington, W. Va.; Evansville, Ind.; Ironwood, Mich.; Pittsburg, Kans.; Denver, Colo.; Rock Springs, Wyo.; and Billings, Mont. These cars, which the Bureau of Mines now owns, are so stationed as to be as readily accessible as possible to the thickly populated mining regions, so that they may go as soon as possible wherever an explosion occurs; and the Government maintains over the country rescue stations at the following places: Pittsburgh, Pa.; Knoxville, Tenn.; Birmingham, Ala.; McAlester, Okla.; Urbana, Ill.; and Seattle, Wash., where equipment is readily accessible, and to be used in case of accidents, where it may be taken wherever needed.

We think sometimes of the great catastrophes that occur and that are called to our attention by the great loss of life in mines, and yet there goes out from day to day human lives in the mines which the newspapers do not record in their headlines. Here and there some miner's life goes out on account of a falling roof or some other accident in the mine. One by one these men lose their lives.

I believe that if an additional appropriation was made in this bill these eight mining cars might be properly equipped, which they will be with this appropriation of $30.000 that is to be made, and then if sufficient money is given these cars might be in continual use for 11 or 12 months in a year; and in that case they would do a great deal of good in the work of instruction among these employees in the mine.

Then, another thing: With each of these cars there should be a mining engineer, a man who is versed in the industry, who knows what a mine ought to be to insure safety, who knows what a mine needs, to go through that mine and suggest to the operators certain improvements that ought to be made. Then there ought to be a first-aid surgeon, who shall go along with the car, and who will instruct the miners in first-aid work. As it is now these cars must go out without these men, without these men who are necessary to make this work as effective as it should be.

My friends, when we think of the thousands and hundreds of thousands of men who work in the mines; when we think of the importance of the mining industry of this country; when we think that it is next to that of agriculture in basic wealth; when we stop and consider that for agriculture we appropriate each year nearly $30,000,000; when we think what this Government has done for the benefit of agriculture, increasing the production of the farm, which I am pleased to see; when we think of this we do not realize that in this great mining industry, which is the basic industry second to that of farming, we appropriate less than $1,000,000. I hope that our good friends on the Committee on Appropriations, before this bill shall have been completed, may conclude that in this case, in this item in the bill, they will willingly give to this great industry a little more help than it now has.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not a fact that the State mining bureaus cooperate with these Federal agencies and increase the efficiency all through the several States?

Mr. FOSTER. That is true with respect to almost all of the States of the Union. Where there is any considerable mining done, the States are taking hold of this work. For instance, in the State of Illinois the State legislature appropriated the money for the purchase of three cars, in order that they may be taken over the State of Illinois, and experienced men instruct the 82,000 miners who are working in this industry in that great coal-mining State.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was going to ask the gentleman what other States had done. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois to state what other States have done any of this work, instead of attempting to place all the burden on the Federal Government.

Mr. BRYAN. The State of Washington has done a lot.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What has it done? It has done nothing.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from New York is entirely mistaken when he says we have done nothing.

Mr. FOSTER. The State of Pennsylvania employs 50 inspectors, at $3,000 each, besides in other ways to help the industry. The States spend as much money as the Federal Government for the benefit of their own miners; all the mining States, so far as I know, are helping along in this work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is what they ought to do.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman examined some of the "bad" provisions in this bill on the subject of the Bureau of Mines? I say, has the gentleman examined the provisions in the pending bill relating to the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I have read these items very carefully.

Mr. MANN. If we go on at the same rate, how much will it cost the General Government inside of five years for having created the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to my colleague that I do not know, but I would suggest to him that as important an industry as coal mining or metal mining is in this country, the Federal Government can well afford to spend something more than it is now doing for the benefit of these great industries.

Mr. MANN. Is it any more important than making woolen clothes?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know how my colleague could compare so important a work of saving human life with the making of woolen clothes.

Mr. BRYAN. It is attended with more danger.

Mr. FOSTER. But we spend nearly $30,000,000 for agriculture, or will expend this amount when the extension bill lately passed is in full operation, which is all right, and we all agree the amount spent for investigation and instruction among farmers is beneficial.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; we do not.

Mr. FOSTER. Nearly that much, taking all the appropriations for the benefit of agriculture.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. Nearly that much, when we count up all the provisions of the different bills, or, as the figures furnished by the Agriculture Department, $27,950,000.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that the National Government should assume all the responsibility for human life and that the States should have nothing to do with it?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly I think the States should do their part. That same argument might apply to many items that come up in appropriation bills; and if my colleague takes that view of it in reference to the mining industry, which is so important, I hope we will endeavor to see that many of the other items that are of less importance are taken out of the different bills as they are reported to the House.

Mr. MANN. The fact is, we aid agriculture and we aid mining. The cost of our aid to agriculture has increased from practically nothing since I came here to $22,000,000 or $23,000,000 a year, and I believe in every item of it. Whether we are going to do the same thing for mining I do not know; but there are a hundred other industries of great importance, and it would seem as though those States which make great amounts of money out of having mines within their borders ought not to seek to shift the responsibility upon the General Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I am thoroughly in accord with my colleague in reference to the Agricultural bill and the items in it, but I think the gentleman is mistaken about the statement he makes, because I do not believe the States are attempting to shift the burden upon the Federal Government with reference to mining any more than they do in reference to education or agriculture and other matters for which Congress provides.

Mr. MANN. I take back the suggestion about the States endeavoring to shift the burden. I do not think the States are endeavoring to shift the burden. I think the Chief of the Bureau of Mines is endeavoring to claim the burden.

Mr. FOSTER. No; I think the gentleman is wrong about that. The Director of the Bureau of Mines is a very capable official, and is doing splendid work, and his work is appreciated all over the country by those who know what he is doing.

Mr. FARR. Is it not a fact that some of the States were opposed to the Federal Bureau of Mines?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know as to that. The gentleman may be correct about it, but I want to say to my colleague that the State from which he comes has not endeavored to shift the responsibility, but that it has endeavored to do its part. The State has taken hold of this work, and it is not intended by the Bureau of Mines that this work shall keep up forever, but that after the preliminary educational work has been done it shall be turned over to the States to continue it, and that is all that is intended for the use of these mine rescue cars.

We sometimes too little appreciate under what difficulties and dangers these men go into the mines and what their dangers are. This great industry has not been given the attention its importance deserves. I believe this House will continue to stand by the Bureau of Mines in the great work it is doing in the educational work among the miners, and the most important work of making mining safer and saving of human life. Operators are interested in this work, as well to them it may mean more safety of the lives of the miners, and the more economical mining and furnishing to the people cheaper fuel. Let us not forget we should do our part to encourage this important industry by giving the necessary appropriation to carry on the work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report that they had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman two questions: First, if the gentleman knows what the temperature to-day is?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have been very cool. I never pay any attention to the thermometer. The more you watch the thermometer the warmer you get.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the gentleman has used up three handkerchiefs to-day, and that is an extreme number for a married man. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 148. Joint resolution authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to participate through their accredited diplomatic agents to the United States, in the National Star-Spangled Banner Centennial Celebration.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 3334. An act authorizing the quitclaiming of the interest of the United States in certain land situated in Hampden County, Mass.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, June 9, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of harbor at Morehead City, N. C., with a view to extending the present project westerly to the main channel of Bogue Sound and to widening channel in front of the wharves so as to provide a turning basin of adequate area (H. Doc. No. 1022); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Cape Channel, including the inner and outer approaches thereto, on the east side of Pamlico Sound, N. C. (H. Doc. No. 1023); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting estimate for the construction of a breakwater in connection with the marine hospital at Chicago, Ill., with the request that it be incorporated in the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. Doc. No. 1024); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Acting Secretary of the Navy reporting under the provisions of the naval act of June 24, 1910, that the Navy Department has considered, ascertained, adjusted, and determined the amount due the claimant therein specified on account of damages for which the vessels of the Navy were found to be responsible (H. Doc. No. 1025); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. HINDS, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16477) to conduct investigations and experiments for ameliorating the damage wrought to the fisheries by predaceous fishes and aquatic animals, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 780), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 9, 1914.

(Continuation of the legislative day of Friday, June 5, 1914.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). The Senate resumes the consideration of House bill 14385.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. O'GORMAN and Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hughes	Overman	Smoot
Brady	James	Owen	Sterling
Bristow	Johnson	Page	Sutherland
Bryan	Jones	Perkins	Swanson
Burton	Kenyon	Pittman	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kern	Ransdell	Thornton
Clapp	La Follette	Shafroth	Tillman
Colt	Lane	Sheppard	Townsend
Culberson	McCumber	Sherman	Vardaman
Cummins	McLean	Shields	Walsh
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Simmons	West
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.	White
Goff	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Works
Gronna	Norris	Smith, Mich.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], all of whom are paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Out of order I ask leave to introduce a bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to offer and have considered as pending, and that it be printed and lie on the table, an amendment to the text of the committee amendment. I ask that it may be read.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida will state his point of order.

Mr. BRYAN. It is against the rule of the Senate to offer a resolution or bill while a Senator has the floor, and it is the duty of the Chair to enforce this rule. The rule makes it the duty of the Chair to enforce it without a point of order being raised.

Mr. JONES. This is an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. BRYAN. But the Senator from Michigan has the floor and is addressing the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the rule of the Senate that a Senator upon the floor can not be interrupted when making his address, and it is the duty of the Chair to enforce the rule if it is insisted upon. The Senator from Michigan will proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I referred yesterday to the attitude of Great Britain toward the Spanish possessions in this hemisphere with some detail. I presume that Mr. Clayton, who was in the Senate in 1854, knew something about those relations, and I desire to read from his speech on January 3 some quotations bearing upon that question. Senator Clayton said:

> It is said by the Earl of Clarendon that Great Britain intends "religiously" to observe the stipulations of the treaty—

That is, the treaty with Spain over her possessions in this hemisphere—

> Yes, sir; "religiously"—that is the word. By the second article of the treaty of Versailles of the 3d of September, 1783, it was provided that the two parties to it should "exactly and religiously" observe all of the provisions of all former treaties and, among the rest, of the treaty of Paris of 1673. The object of the seventeenth article of said last treaty was to prevent the British from occupying this very country about which we are now debating. They obligated themselves "religiously and exactly"—such are the words—to observe that treaty. It is interesting to look back at the history of the negotiations attending the treaty of 1873 and the conduct of Great Britain afterwards, to see how "religiously and exactly" those stipulations were observed.

Lord John Russell has within the last year published the correspondence of Charles James Fox, who was the British premier at the time of the negotiation of the treaty of Versailles by the Duke of Manchester. By looking into the second volume of that correspondence the minutes of the cabinet, to which the treaty of 1783 was referred, will be found. It will there be seen that the British cabinet were recommended that the sixth Spanish article, as it was called—that is, the sixth article of that treaty—should be deferred for six months, and that the rest of the treaty should be signed by the negotiators. That article was the one which bound Great Britain not to occupy or hold any part of the Spanish continent embracing, as was understood, what we now call Central America and the Mosquito coast. Mr. Fox, as will be found by looking at the volume to which I have referred, immediately wrote to the King (on the 18th of July, 1783), stating:

"There has been a great deal of discussion upon this matter; but it appearing to be still in our power to put our own interpretation upon the words 'Continent Espagnol' and to determine upon prudential considerations whether the Mosquito shore comes under that description or not, it was the opinion of Your Majesty's confidential servants present (except Lord Stormont) that the desirableness of getting the treaty signed ought to prevail."

Remark, sir, they were to determine the meaning of the treaty by prudential considerations only. Lord Russell says Fox was a statesman who never would condescend to an intrigue, and never would betray a principle.

It was soon found by the Spaniards that the considerations which were to govern the construction of that treaty were not the "religious views" of the case, but the "prudential considerations." "If from prudential considerations hereafter," says Mr. Fox, in effect, "we should see fit to construe the words 'Spanish continent' to mean something entirely different from what the Spaniards understood them to mean in the making of the treaty, we shall be at liberty to do so." This was the mental reservation made by one of the most fair and ingenuous of British statesmen at the time of negotiating an important treaty. The King wrote back, saying, in effect, that "it was a very untoward circumstance that a definitive treaty could not be made without leaving clear ground for fresh disputes."

Mr. President, even the English King sickened of the duplicity of his foreign office.

Sir and Senators, this treaty that we have before us to-day is the third attempt upon the part of Great Britain to unify America and Great Britain in this great project in Central America and at Panama. Every time our countrymen have broached with seriousness the question of the construction of a canal across the Isthmus, for prudential considerations Great Britain reasserted her undisguised interest in her pretended possessions in Central America. Again and again did she manifest her intention, at least to Spain, to withdraw from this attempt to acquire territory against her specified promise not to do so, and again and again did she reassert it whenever she found it necessary to participate in any negotiation looking toward concessionary rights from any Central American State regarding a canal. At last she encountered a perfect hurricane of American public opinion. Again and again did Mr. Lowell, at the instance of Secretary Blaine, call the attention of the British foreign office to the intention of our countrymen to construct a canal across Nicaragua or the Isthmus of Panama which should constitute a part of the American coast line.

I said yesterday that President Arthur undertook to compose these differences by striking straight from the shoulder at the delay and annoyance suffered by this country as a result of treaty engagements which certain distinguished gentlemen of our own country were from time to time insisting still had vitality and life.

President Arthur directed Mr. Frelinghuysen to enter into a treaty with Nicaragua. That treaty was made in 1884. It was called the Frelinghuysen-Zavalla treaty. It provided that the canal should be built by the United States of America and owned by it and the Republic of Nicaragua, and managed as hereinafter provided.

Article 2 said that there shall be an alliance between the United States of America and the Republic of Nicaragua, and the former agreed to protect the integrity of the territory of the latter.

It has been said that the ratification of that treaty would have perhaps established the American status in Central America much earlier than the present Hay-Pauncefote treaty could have possibly done, and I am quite ready to believe it. It failed, however, of ratification because Mr. Cleveland's election changed the political complexion of the Government, and it was thought that he could with greater propriety deal with that situation than could the outgoing administration.

What followed the Frelinghuysen-Zavalla undertaking? Why, Mr. President, this act passed by the House of Representatives on the 2d day of May, 1900, followed the negotiations of President Arthur, and it had great significance. It had a direct object in view and went after it with a determination and a relentlessness that struck terror to those communities that had relied for perpetual rights across the Isthmus upon our laxity. I think I ought to have that act printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, because there is not a line or a syllable in it which recognizes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Every line of that act is repugnant to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, made practically coincident with the passage of this bill.

There was a very spirited debate in the House of Representatives when this measure was before the House. I remember distinctly. The Senator from Virginia, now occupying the chair [Mr. SWANSON], also remembers that debate very distinctly, for he, too, was then a Member of the House of Representatives and one of the men who voted for the passage of this Nicaraguan bill.

I am going to read this act, because I want it officially certified. It is not an ordinary bill. It was read twice and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate, a committee whose members were familiar with this proposition. I think the late Senator from Alabama, Mr. Morgan, was an influential member and favored its passage. The bill reads:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to acquire from the States of Costa Rica and Nicaragua, for and in behalf of the United States, control of such portion of territory now belonging to Costa Rica and Nicaragua as may be desirable and necessary on which to excavate, construct, and protect a canal of such depth and capacity as will be sufficient for the movements of ships of the greatest tonnage and draft now in use, from a point near Greytown, on the Caribbean Sea, via Lake Nicaragua, to Breto, on the Pacific Ocean; and such sum as may be necessary to secure such control is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That when the President has secured full control over the territory in section 1 referred to, he shall direct the Secretary of War to excavate and construct a canal and waterway from a point on the shore of the Caribbean Sea near Greytown, by way of Lake Nicaragua, to a point near Breto, on the Pacific Ocean. Such canal shall be of such capacity and depth that it may be used by vessels of the largest tonnage and greatest depth now in use, and shall be supplied with all necessary locks and other appliances to meet the necessities of vessels passing from Greytown to Breto; and the Secretary of War shall also construct such safe and commodious harbors at the termini of said canal and such provisions for defense as may be necessary for the safety and protection of said canal and harbors.

SEC. 3. That the President shall cause such surveys as may be necessary for said canal and harbors, and in the constructing of the same employ such persons as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 4. That in the excavation and construction of said canal the San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua, or such parts of each as may be made available, shall be used.

SEC. 5. That in any negotiations with the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica the President may have, the President is authorized to guarantee to said States the use of said canal and harbors, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by said States or by citizens thereof.

SEC. 6. That the sum of $10,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, toward the project herein contemplated; and the Secretary of War is further hereby authorized to enter into a contract or contracts for materials and work that may be deemed necessary for the proper excavation, construction, completion, and defense of said canal, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be hereafter made, not to exceed in the aggregate $140,000,000.

Passed the House of Representatives May 2, 1900.

Attest:

A. MCDOWELL, Clerk.
By WILLIAM J. BROWNING, Chief Clerk.

Senators, there is not a line or a syllable or a sentence of that bill which recognizes any treaty right upon the part of Great Britain, and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty dealt directly with Nicaragua. Senators now seem unusually scrupulous over the rights of Great Britain, when they should be excessively virile over the defense of American rights.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], then a Member of the House, made a few remarks about it, and if he was very solicitous about our treaty obligations at that time his remarks fail to disclose it.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], usually exceedingly scrupulous, then said:

In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that we are proceeding with undue haste in this matter; that so formidable are the interests that are arraigned and have been for years arrayed against this measure; so strong is the caution and fear of many statesmen; so strong is the opposition of those who object to Government participation in an enterprise of this kind; so formidable is the moral argument that is presented to us with reference to the restraining effect which it is claimed that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should have on our action—if all these sources of opposition are united against this measure, it will be delayed and possibly defeated.

He said further:

A certain amount of brute force is required in order to put this bill into the legislative hopper.

"A certain amount of brute force," and he was willing to be one of the——

Mr. BRISTOW. Brutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I will not say that, but he was willing, at least, not to stay the brutish instinct, if there was such a thing in his nature.

Mr. BURTON. Who said that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The distinguished, erudite, able, and conscientious Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

Now, think of it—and I want my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who seems to be busily engaged on the other side of the Chamber, to consider for a moment what would have happened if the doctrine which he urged last Saturday had been effective. Why, sir, this bill would have been passed in the Senate in 20 minutes, just as he always expects to pass bills perfected by himself, without discussion; and yet, note the mellowing effect of time.

Oh, no, Mr. President; I can never agree, so long as I am a Member of this body, to any snap judgment on the measures brought here for our consideration. Delay in this matter has almost composed the differences dividing the other side of the Chamber; and if we can compose the differences on the other side of the Chamber by discussion and delay, we may prevent the country from blundering, as is the natural habit of the other side whenever it has freedom of action. [Laughter.]

My friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who does not seem to be here at this moment, looked this record over yesterday with some care after I had called his attention to it, and said to me last night, "You have got the history of that bill mixed." "No," I said, "I have not got it mixed; you have got your record mixed. To be sure, I did not vote for the bill, because I was paired with a Democrat from South Carolina, but I would have voted for it if I had been permitted to vote that day." I cheered as loudly as I could the speeches of JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and Senator NEWLANDS and Senator SHAFROTH and thus gave them my moral support.

Do you remember where Representative Cooney was from?

Mr. BURTON. I forget.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Somewhere in the South; I think Missouri. Mr. Cooney was a very able man——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A Frenchman?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I think he was not a Frenchman. I think some of his ancestors were born in Ireland and some in Connecticut. [Laughter.] That is my recollection. Mr. Cooney tried to solve that situation, which was very perplexing to our friends who opposed such drastic and sudden action upon the part of this Government. Mr. Cooney said in that debate:

> I have never witnessed in this House or elsewhere so remarkable an exhibition of logic as has accompanied the discussion of this bill. I have never seen a measure denounced by so many men who declare they will vote for it.

[Laughter.]

Why, history repeats itself. The proposition we are now considering has been denounced by everybody, and yet a few men who have evidently received their orders propose to cast their votes for a measure they do not approve.

Said Mr. Cooney:

> The undertaking is new and foreign to the usual functions of government. It proposes the expenditure of vast sums upon an improvement in a foreign country and a necessary subtraction from the appropriations for improvements in our own country, where, in many places, trade and commerce are dead and lie languishing and people are being daily impoverished, and where, by the generous assistance of the Government, more trade and commerce and wealth would be built up than can ever be realized by the United States from any isthmian canal.
> I partake of the feeling indulged in by all Americans that an isthmian canal should be built, owned, and operated by the Government of the United States independently of any European power. That is one reason why I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. President, that is fine logic. He opposes a bill which authorizes the construction of an American canal under the American Government with American money because he wants a canal owned by the Government constructed by American money and built by American genius!

Senators, let me quote further from Mr. Cooney:

> It is made to masquerade in the highly wrought colors of a manufactured patriotism, for the moment, to facilitate its passage through this House; but when it returns from Senate, through the washtub of the conference committee, its color will be faded into harmony with every line of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

What Hay-Pauncefote treaty is that? He wants the color of this legislation to fade into every line of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. What Hay-Pauncefote treaty? The first one, to which no reference has been made by any Senator upon this floor? He wants the washtub of the conference committee to fade every line of the House bill into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which was made in February, 1900. That is the treaty about which they were talking, and it is a treaty to which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] never referred in his masterful address. He did not even dignify it by letting us know that such a proposition ever had been presented to the Senate. Yet the senior Senator from New York sat at the Cabinet table where it was approved, and if such leadership had been permitted to prevail, the Senate of the United States would have ratified the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, sealing a perpetual partnership with Great Britain in regard to the canal, with no right to fortify or to defend it. Who is there here now who would vote to ratify that treaty? And yet Mr. Cooney—I suppose one of the followers of our honored friend from Ohio—said that when this bill came from the washtub of the conference committee its color would be faded into harmony with every line of that treaty.

Mr. Cooney also says:

> That treaty has been vigorously condemned by the American people.

Why, Mr. President, has it? Why, I am amazed that that treaty was condemned by the American people. You do not mean to tell me that there was any treaty with England concerning a canal across the Isthmus of Panama that was ever condemned by the American people! Why, we have heard nothing about it during the debate. Nobody has refreshed our recollections regarding it. If it was condemned by the American people, then the State Department must have been put upon notice that there should be no more trifling about the ownership or control and operation of the canal across the Isthmus.

Is not that a fair conclusion? Is not that the atmosphere in which the treaty now before us was perfected and considered? Surely. When Mr. Cooney, a Missouri Democrat, admits it, why go further? [Laughter.]

> That treaty has been vigorously condemned by the American people—

Says Mr. Cooney—

> It was put to sleep in the Senate by popular indignation.

Where is my honored friend [Mr. ROOT], the great Senator from New York? I should like to ask him—and I say it with the greatest respect, for he has no more ardent admirer in this Chamber than the Senator from Michigan—if the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was put to death in the Senate of the United States with his consent?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from New York did approve its death; and it was put to death because it excluded the United States from that political and military control which is given to it by the second and existing Hay-Pauncefote treaty, without one word in negotiation, in correspondence, or in agreement to change the rights of all the world to equal treatment in regard to the charging of tolls.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am glad to hear that statement from the Senator from New York. He is usually very frank.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. He is exceptionally able; I greatly admire him; but I should like to inquire when this hostility to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was suggested by the Senator from New York? Whether he opposed it at the meetings of the Cabinet, of which he was a member? And whether Mr. Hay submitted it to the Senate in spite of the protests of the Secretary of War, now the honored Senator from New York?

Mr. ROOT. No, Mr. President; the attention of the Senator from New York was called to the subject first by the discussion which arose upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Up to that time the Senator from New York had not read or seen the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And knew nothing of the negotiations?

Mr. ROOT. No; nothing about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then when I make the statement that it was largely the product of John Hay's labors, am I correct?

Mr. ROOT. Of course.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very glad to know that the Senator from New York, who was an influential member of the Cabinet and sat about the table with the lamented Mr. Hay, had no part in that performance, so universally condemned throughout the country. But I marvel that he could be straitjacketed so soon again by the same agents and not know it, and that we are still struggling to be free without the help of the great Senator from New York.

I regret that the morning papers say that I said anything unkind about the Senator from New York. I knew the Senator from New York before he entered public life; I knew how ideally he was equipped for public service; I have felt an honest pride in his brilliant career; and I rejoice that we can know from his lips that one member of the Cabinet of Mr. McKinley did not give consideration to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator will permit me to say that if I had known I was going to run into so many compliments when I casually entered the Chamber a moment ago I would have stayed out. Let me say also that I feel so great a confidence in the friendship of the Senator from Michigan that I never would think for one moment of his saying anything unkind about me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. ROOT. And if he did say anything which to others appeared unkind, I should know he did not mean it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I would not say anything unkind about the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have not finished with the Senator from New York——

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment to enable me to ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can not my friend from Illinois restrain himself a moment?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, unquestionably; but, Mr. President, in the presence of the mendacious constructions of the Senator from Michigan no justice-loving man can restrain himself from an expression of indignation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan has the floor, and can not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to reply to the Senator from New York, and then I will cheerfully yield to the Senator from Illinois, for whom I have the highest respect and who is numbered among my warmest friends here.

What I desire to say in the presence of the Senator from New York is this, that the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, according to prominent Members of the House of Representatives, was driven out of the Senate by the overwhelming indignation of the American people. I know it was charged at the time that an effort was being made to bring about an alliance between Great Britain and the United States. In such an atmosphere American rights should have been made plain. I think our interests were properly safeguarded. The Senator from New York still feels that we have undefined obligations to perform, and entirely out of harmony with the spirit of that time.

This is the third treaty in regard to which I have disagreed with the Senator from New York. I found him arrayed against my attempt to limit the use of the waters of the St. Marys River to the line fixed by the Webster and Ashburton treaty, and disagreed radically with his views, which were far more satisfactory to Canadians than to the people of Michigan, whom I represent——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then I found myself in opposition to him on the fisheries convention, when Mr. David Starr Jordan, representing this Government, has seen fit, in his treaty with Great Britain, to exempt Georgian Bay, an arm of Lake Huron, from the operation of the regulations, while including Saginaw Bay, another arm of Lake Huron. I found my honored friend quite willing to exempt Georgian Bay, and very loath to permit me to have Saginaw Bay exempted. I can not exactly understand the viewpoint of one who seems to be so intensely American, and at the same time so generous with Mother England.

I now yield with pleasure to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desired to put to the Senator from New York a query that would lead to information. I should now like to ask the Senator if he will inform me who it was who negotiated the treaty which, as he says, so omitted protection to the United States in the particular respects which he has outlined, and who were the parties who prepared that document and consummated it?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will gladly give to the Senator from Illinois any information I have, but I do not quite know what treaty he is talking about.

Mr. LEWIS. I refer to the particular provision that the Senator from New York said omitted the necessary protection to the United States in such manner that he himself was compelled to take such steps as the Senator from Michigan had previously criticized.

Mr. ROOT. I do not recognize the theater of action at all. I took no steps about any treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. I understood the Senator from New York to say, in response to a criticism on the part of the able Senator from Michigan, that the reason the Senator from New York had taken certain steps and assumed certain positions respecting a certain document was because that document had omitted to provide for a form of military defense and proper guardianship of the rights of the United States; and I understood that the Senator referred then to the original treaty, or the treaty designated as the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Illinois misapprehended the colloquy.

Mr. LEWIS. That is rather likely. I may have done so.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from New York took no steps whatever about either treaty. The Senator from Michigan asked the Senator from New York whether he approved the putting to death of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and the Senator from New York responded that he did

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Illinois is seeking from the Senator from New York to know who prepared the particular document to which the Senator from New York alluded, in response to the Senator from Michigan, that the document had not provided sufficient military defenses and guardianship for the United States. To what document did the Senator from New York allude?

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from New York alluded to what is called the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, then, may I ask the Senator from New York who it was who prepared that particular document and consummated it in behalf of the Government?

Mr. ROOT. It appears upon the face of the treaty. It was negotiated by the Secretary of State, at that time John Hay.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the Senator from Illinois finished?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is not a Senator in this Chamber, including the distinguished Senator from New York, who would vote to ratify the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty if it were pending here to-day.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator from Michigan permit me to call his attention to the circumstance that in the draft of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty describing all nations who were to use the canal on terms of perfect equality the words "observing these rules" did not appear, although they were inserted in the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. And when the first draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was accepted by the Senate it was accepted by the Senate of the United States as drafted by the Secretary of State, and agreed to practically by all the authorities of the United States with no limitation upon the words "all nations." So the term "all nations" in the first draft of that treaty confessedly included the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, Mr. President, I want to return to Mr. Cooney.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Who is Mr. Cooney, may I ask the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You must look back over the records of your party associates.

Mr. LEWIS. There is no record of fame or glory that I can recall of my party which indicates the name Cooney.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Illinois certainly ought to know him. He was in the House of Representatives, a distinguished Member from Missouri.

Mr. LEWIS. Among those I regret that I have lost that name.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Listen. This is what he says——

Mr. LEWIS. I can not accept the wisdom of a Member so unknown to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a rule of this body which is well known to us, and I think it ought to be observed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Here is what Mr. Cooney says, speaking about the Nicaragua bill:

> There is a general opinion throughout the country that the treaty known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is as dead as Hector and that somehow Blaine was the Achilles that slew it and dragged it to pieces at his chariot wheels.

Mr. Cooney had an art in portraying his inmost emotions that has been rarely excelled.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois rises to a parliamentary inquiry. He will state it.

Mr. LEWIS. I am only anxious to know to what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] alluded when he spoke of a general rule. If the Senator from Michigan will yield to me, I desire to know it and to avail myself of it. In what way am I impinging upon a rule? I am anxious to know.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had reference to the rule which requires that no Senator shall interrupt another during debate unless he addresses the Chair and obtains permission.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why suspend this illustrious American in the air while parliamentary questions are being discussed?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the parliamentary question which was made ought to be settled. I have no disposition to interfere with the procedure of the Senate in any way, except that unless Senators do get permission from the Chair before interrupting a Senator on the floor we will have a condition of things here which will not be to our credit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has well stated the rule. A Senator must address the Chair and get permission, through the Chair, of the Senator who is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I only desire to say, through the Chair, that there had been no ignorance of the rule or ignoring it on my part. The Senator from Michigan had yielded to me, and, therefore, I think the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire was irrelevant.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I find no fault with the inquiry of the Senator from Illinois.

My honored friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], sitting by my side, did not believe the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was dead. His course is always consistent; his vote usually stands out almost alone as a shining example of personal and official integrity, and I honor him for it.

But the House of Representatives considered that treaty dead. The House of Representatives considered the treaty made by Mr. Hay and Mr. Pauncefote in February, 1900, an affront and promptly answered it. Do not get the impression that that answer did not find its way into the British foreign office. Do not imagine for one moment that the British foreign office was unmindful of the attitude of the American people regarding a canal across the Isthmus or even through the Republic of Nicaragua. The truth is that that bill and the vote in the House of Representatives went like magic to the Court of St. James, and they immediately recast their position lest they should be left out in the cold altogether.

I admired John Hay as much as the Senator from New York could have admired him—a sweet-tempered, able, manly man, kindly, refined, sympathetic, unpretentious, modest, faithful. I join with the great Senator from New York in commending his simple virtues. But, Mr. President, he had just returned from the Court of St. James. He had just come out of the atmosphere of British officialdom He had not been at home for some time when that first treaty was made, and coming home he did not realize the tremendous importance of reflecting the American attitude in whatever was done regarding this canal. He tried his first plan of joint ownership with England in the canal and failed. The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not repeal or rescind the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It gave Great Britain the right to join with the United States in making rules for its operation and control, and it forbade us to fortify or defend it.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] brought the first treaty in here. I do not know now whether he approved it or not. It does not seem possible that he could have approved it, because it is so completely out of harmony with all he has said in this body that I can not believe that that treaty met with his approval. I do not believe it would have ever seen this Senate floor if the Senator from Massachusetts had not been convinced that the amendments to be proposed to it would be adopted by his colleagues. If I am wrong about that I should like the Senator from Massachusetts to set me right. I do not believe he was ever consulted about it at all, although he was the ranking member of the Committee on Foreign Relations then as now. I have too much confidence in his genuine Americanism to believe that he would consent to a surrender of our rights in the treaty now before us.

Secretary Hay said in transmitting the treaty to the Senate:

> The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of construction is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances and considering that won by the new treaty, Great Britain is relieved of all responsibility and burden of maintaining its neutrality and security. It was thought fair to omit the prohibition that no fortifications should be erected commanding the canal or the waters adjacent.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator referred to me in connection with the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. At that time the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He was one of the ablest chairmen that committee ever had. Mr. Hay, some time before the making of the treaty, asked Senator Davis and myself if we did not think it was desirable to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and get rid of it by an agreement with England. We told him that we did think so. Of course everyone thought that it was most desirable to get rid of that obstacle to the building of the canal. We were not consulted any further in regard to it.

When the treaty appeared in its completed form it contained provisions to which neither Senator Davis nor I could assent; and the amendments which were reported out of the Foreign Relations Committee were intended to cure what we believed to be the defects of the treaty. One, as the Senator remembers, was the insertion of the words "is hereby superseded." It was a very vital amendment, indeed. Another was striking out the invitation of other powers to guarantee. We made three changes, I think, altogether on the recommendation of the committee.

When those amendments had been made, we ratified the treaty. I thought it was safe. We were not consulted as to the details of the treaty at all; merely as to the general question whether it would not be desirable to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and, of course, everybody thought so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator if he is willing to answer whether he would have voted an appropriation for the construction of the canal across the Isthmus at Panama under the interpretation of our rights now given by the President of the United States?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not understand exactly what the Senator means.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I mean, would the Senator have voted to build this canal if he had known what the attitude of the present President of the United States would be with reference to our rights therein, and that attitude was to be affirmed by his party associates here?

Mr. LODGE. I could not possibly have anticipated what any President thought. I should have voted appropriations to build the canal, even if my construction of our rights under the treaty had been disputed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator would not have voted for an appropriation to build the canal under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And he certainly would not have voted to build the canal under the original draft of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. LODGE. You mean, as unamended by the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. No; I think not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am glad to have the Senator say that, because I know that I voted for the first money that was appropriated for the construction of this canal, and I would not have voted a dollar for it on any other theory than that the United States was building it, was to control it, and that it was to be a part of our coast line. I would not have voted a dollar for it otherwise. I am glad to know that the Senator from Massachusetts takes that view.

Mr. LODGE. I do not take precisely that view, because I should have voted to build the canal even if we had not reserved the right of discrimination.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On the theory that any differences might be arbitrated later?

Mr. LODGE. No; I mean that if it were unquestionably not ours to discriminate, if we had agreed specifically in so many words that we would not discriminate in favor of our own ships.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. That would not have prevented me desiring the construction of the canal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, there has been a desire ever since the American Government was formed to build such a canal; there has been a desire upon the part of thinkers and students and poets and dreamers for 500 years to build a canal across the Isthmus.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. Suppose this canal had been constructed by a stock company; in what way would the Government have secured to the ships of its own citizens free passage through the canal?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think the Government would have had some difficulty in appropriating private property without due process of law and without proper compensation; but that question does not arise. When we were talking about the canal being constructed by private individuals, by a private corporation, of course the Government was merely a friendly suzerain; we were not dominant, and exercised no sovereignty there; this has been true during all the years of the Panama Railroad. Great Britain has not asked to share in the management of the Panama Railroad, and I do not think she would ever have asked to share in the management of this canal had it not been for the overweening ambition of her fair daughter to the north of us, who seems to have awakened the quickening spirit of conquest in the mother country.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. Is it not a fact that England exercised a protectorate over Egypt and territory in that section? Is it not a fact that the Suez Canal was built by a stock company and that the ships of every nation that pass through there pay tolls?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Egypt is a semisovereign State under the suzerainty of the Ottoman Porte. The Khedive is hereditary ruler and receives his investiture from the Sultan of Turkey, but its affairs are practically administered by Great Britain. After private parties had gone down into their pockets and put up the money to build the Suez Canal, Great Britain, with her usual foresight and acquisitiveness, got possession of $20,000,000 worth of that stock—about 176,000 shares—upon which a dividend of upward of 35 per cent per annum is annually earned. If, out of these profits, she chooses to give back to her vessels passing through the Suez Canal the tolls they pay, she evidently thinks it is a good investment. The Suez Canal is 103 miles long. It cost a little over $126,000,000. In 1911 more than 4,500 vessels passed through it, with an aggregate tonnage of 16,581,898 net tons, for which service the canal company received $25,168,400. The tolls charged are higher than at Panama and the service not as good. It takes 17 hours to pass through the Suez Canal, while it will require less than 12 hours to pass through Panama. Their canal is 28 feet deep, while ours has a depth of 41 feet and is but 54 miles in length. The distance saved from New York to Pacific ports of North America is about 8,000 miles through the Panama Canal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question propounded to the Senator from Michigan by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST], as I understand, is how the United States would be able to get its ships of commerce through free of tolls if this canal had been built and was owned by a private company. Is there the slightest doubt that the United States Government could have paid the tolls for the ships of its citizens, that it could have delivered the money out of its Treasury into the hands of the owners of those ships, and that that money could have been paid to the owners of the canal for transporting the ships through the canal?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There is no doubt about that at all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, if that be true, how is the situation of the United States altered in that respect when the United States itself becomes the owner of the canal? If it may pay the tolls in advance for the ships of its own citizens going through the canal when the canal is owned by a private company, is there any reason why it may not pay the tolls of the ships of its citizens when the Government itself owns the canal? That being so, is there any difference in principle between the United States advancing the money in the first instance to the owners of these ships so that they may return the money to the United States in payment of the tolls and relieving them from the payment of the tolls in the beginning? Is there any difference in substance between those two cases?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I see no difference, Mr. President.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If there is any difference, I should like somebody to point it out.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I see no difference. The Senator from Utah is exactly correct; we have no engagement which would interfere with that course. Does the Senator from Utah believe that under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty our Government was precluded from building a canal across the Isthmus of Panama in its own way, and without the consent of Great Britain?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, in the remarks I made the other day I had occasion to discuss that very question. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that I have not the slightest doubt that the Government of the United States under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty could have built the canal across the Isthmus of Panama precisely as it has built it, because the Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not refer to the Isthmus of Panama in its substantive provisions. The Senator from Michigan will read the substantive provisions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in vain to find any reference to the Panama Canal. The references in all those substantive provisions are to Central America, to the particular portions of Central America which are named in the treaty, and to other portions of Central America. Of course, the Isthmus of Panama never was and is not now any part of Central America. The only reference to the Isthmus of Panama is contained in the eighth article of the treaty, and that is not a substantive agreement at all; but it is simply an agreement to thereafter agree with reference to the Isthmus, an agreement which, obviously, could not be enforced because the terms had not been determined upon. It was simply an engagement that thereafter they would make some agreement about it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But that did not rise to the dignity of an agreement.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If they had left 't alone, there was no agreement about it; the whole thing would have been open, just as it would have been in the case of a contract between two individuals, as, for example, if I should stipulate with the Senator from Michigan to do certain things, and further say that if another situation named should arise, he and I would thereafter agree about that. Of course, such an agreement could not be enforced, and either of us would be at liberty to deal with that particular matter in any way we pleased without reference to the agreement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am greatly obliged to the Senator from Utah, who is always careful in his statements and accurate in his judgment. I have read the Clayton-Bulwer treaty over and over again to find an inhibition against the United States Government doing the very thing which we are now doing at the Isthmus of Panama, and I can not find it; very evidently it is not there.

Mr. President, I notice the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] in his seat, and I am moved to ask him whether, among the papers submitted by the Department of State to his committee in response to the resolution of the Senate bearing upon the negotiations for this treaty, there appears anything that takes into account the rising tide of American public opinion against joint ownership in a canal to be built across the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senate several weeks ago passed a resolution requesting the production of all the diplomatic correspondence affecting the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The correspondence which was produced and which has since been printed omitted two letters, one from Secretary Hay to Mr. Choate, the ambassador, and one from the ambassador to Secretary Hay. I am now in possession of copies of those two letters, and at the proper time I shall ask to have them inserted in the RECORD.

In the letter of Ambassador Choate to Secretary Hay he makes specific reference to the legislation then pending in Congress seeking the construction of an isthmian canal which the House passed and which contained a direction to the President to proceed at once to the construction of a canal, as was stated yesterday by the Senator from Michigan, in disregard of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and in disregard of the then pending Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am pleased to have that statement from the Senator from New York, as it adds another important chapter to the interesting events leading up to the treaty of 1901.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, right at that point will the Senator from Michigan permit me to call his attention to statements made by the officers of this Government, as far back as 1880, with reference to the relationship of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the Isthmus?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The first reference is in a communication addressed to the President of the United States by the then Secretary of State, Mr. Evarts, in the course of which he says:

> But the United States undertook by this provision to extend to Great Britain such participation in the general benefits of any interoceanic connection which might be opened in these countries, as was afforded by the principles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and these were to be secured by "treaty stipulations"—

That is, as I have already stated, by a subsequent agreement—to be made at the proper time and under such conditions as might appear wisest and best when that time should come.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Exactly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mark that—to be made at the proper time—

That is the subsequent agreement—

to be made at the proper time and under such conditions as might appear wisest and best when that time should come—

Leaving, of course, both parties open to make propositions, to accept or reject propositions, and, indeed, to formulate a new agreement wholly independent of anything in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

This declaration, therefore, of a general principle to be put in practice could not and did not modify either the rights or obligations which the United States had acquired or assumed by the treaty with New Granada of 1846, and which still exist in all their binding effect. The concession—

Now, mark this—

The concession, the building, and the administration of the Panama Railroad are a sufficient illustration of the correctness of this view.

Article 8 applied both to a canal and a railroad. It provided that the two Governments would extend by treaty stipulations their protection to this means of communication whether by canal or by railroad. The railroad was constructed; it has been under the control of the United States for a generation or more; the Government of Great Britain has never sought to have these nebulous provisions of article 8 carried into operation with reference to that railroad; and yet they apply as much to a railroad as they do to a canal.

I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Michigan unduly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very glad to have the Senator from Utah proceed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Bearing out that same proposition, there is a communication from Mr. Frelinghuysen, of May 8, 1882, in the course of which he says:

Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty relates only to those projects now (1850) proposed to be established, and expressly contemplates some further "treaty stipulation" on the part of Great Britain with the United States of America and New Granada, now the United States of Colombia, before Great Britain can join the United States in the protectorate of the canal or railway by the Panama route. No such treaty stipulation has been made or has been proposed by Great Britain. Since the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, for 30 years the United States, under the treaty of 1846 with New Granada, has extended protection to the transit from sea to sea by the Panama Railway.

That is the sole protection of the United States. Again, he says:

Should Her Majesty's Government, after obtaining the consent thereto of the United States of Colombia, claim under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the right to join the United States in the protection of the existing Panama Railway or any future Panama Canal, the United States would submit that experience has shown that no such joint protectorate is requisite; that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is subject to the provisions of the treaty of 1846 with New Granada while it exists, which treaty obligates the United States to afford and secures to it the sole protectorate of any transit by the Panama route; and if Great Britain still claimed the right to join in the protectorate, the United States would then determine whether the "treaty stipulations" proposed by Great Britain regulating that joint protectorate were just, and if so, whether the length of time during which Great Britain has concurred in the protection of the Panama route under the treaty with New Granada has or has not relieved the United States from any obligation to accept a proposal from the Government to join in the guaranty.

I could go on further, as there are a number of other statements in the correspondence to the same effect. Later on it is said:

The eighth article, therefore, is simply a declaration of the intention entertained more than 30 years ago by two nations to take up at some subsequent period the negotiation of a treaty on a particular subject. In order to carry out this purpose, treaties must be made by the United States and England with each other and with each of the Central American States through which a canal may be built, defining in detail the stipulations necessary to execute the general principle.

And so the Senator will find all through this correspondence that the position taken by our Secretaries of State away back in that day was that article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty did not contain any substantive provision with reference to the Isthmus of Panama; that whatever was done there, so far as Great Britain might share in it, must be accomplished by subsequent agreement. The whole subject was open for Great Britain to make her proposals and for the United States to accept them or not.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, if any Senator in this Chamber can console himself with the imaginary fact that we inhibited ourselves from constructing a canal across the Isthmus of Panama by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, I am quite content to leave him in his ignorance, because of all the claims which have been put forward in this debate as the basis for our treatment of Great Britain, that claim is the least substantial.

What the Senator from Utah has just said annihilates completely any theory that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty contemplated a canal across the Isthmus of Panama to be jointly owned or regulated and controlled and defended by Great Britain and the United States. There is not a line in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that justifies it. The title of the act speaks only of a canal across Nicaragua; the claim that Great Britain gave up anything when she made the present Hay-Pauncefote treaty is the idlest nonsense. She gave up nothing, for she had nothing to give; but, as usual, was very skillful in trying to extract something from a very uncomfortable situation.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] made a few observations about this House bill which, as usual, were quite to the point and follow the remarks of the present Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], which are recorded in the appendix. The danger from an appendix was not so great then as now. [Laughter.] Listen to my friend from Mississippi. I quote:

I feel not the slightest degree of hesitancy in trusting the American people to protect this canal, even under the language of this bill. I feel that even if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were to be confirmed—and I am almost certain in my own mind that it never will be—

Shades of the Southland! Who is this speaking? Never confirmed! Why not?

Why not? Why should it not be confirmed? If the Clayton-Bulwer engagement still lived, why should it not be confirmed? How can any Senator or Representative take the view that the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty should not have been ratified if he believes that there was still lingering any life in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? The Senator from Mississippi, however, seems to have doubted that.

and I am almost certain in my own mind that it never will be—

He said.

Then, again, I quote from the Senator:

The power given in that treaty to "police" the line of that canal could be taken advantage of for the purpose of garrisoning it in the first place.

Senators, here is a scrupulous, jealous advocate of international honor who proposes to construe the word "police" into the right to garrison that canal from ocean to ocean.

Again, he says:

To "police" the line of that canal could be taken advantage of for the purpose of garrisoning it in the first place, and in the second place leaving it unfortified perhaps in time of peace, but the moment the tocsin of war was sounded I am certain we would proceed with the garrison then and there to throw up earthworks and fortifications necessary to protect the interests of our people and their money invested in the canal.

Sir, that was before the special peace propagandists had completed their organization. [Laughter.] That was before Mr. Carnegie, the peace moderator, had fortified his theories of international comity. The Senator from Mississippi was not then so punctilious and overscrupulous about the construction of a treaty; but "after we are attacked we are to have the right to build fortifications and garrison the canal."

That is like some of the orders claimed to have been given to our soldiers at Vera Cruz—not to shoot until fired upon, and then only at the man who shot at you; that is a species of warfare which even the Carnegie Peace Foundation would hardly approve.

Senators, listen again to my friend the Senator from Mississippi:

When I think of this long route by Cape Horn; when I think of the southern cotton lying upon the banks of the Mississippi on both sides; when I dwell upon the fact that the construction of this canal will virtually empty the Mississippi River into the Pacific Ocean, giving it a new mouth; when I think of the fact that the construction of this canal will realize the dream of Christopher Columbus—

The Senator takes great pride in Christopher Columbus, although he could not have been very much of a Democrat. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON. Is that his language?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; the comment is mine. But he adds:

And enable people to sail directly west from Europe to reach "far Cathay" and the "rich East where Prester John once ruled." It seems to me that all little matters in connection with the mere verbiage of the bill sink into absolute insignificance.

I shall vote for the amendment—

That is, the amendment of Mr. Cooney giving notice that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been denounced. He tried very hard to work in a notice. I do not know whether he gave the notice before my friend from Ohio did or not; but there seemed to be a mad rush there on the part of some of our associates to give notice before they proceeded to unhand the villain. [Laughter.]

I shall vote for the amendment, and I hope it will be defeated, because I think we ought to be plain about expressing beforehand what our undoubted intent is—

So said the Senator from Mississippi—

Then if the amendment shall be defeated—

Now, he is going to vote for something which he hopes will be defeated. [Laughter.] I will read it again:

I shall vote for the amendment, and I hope it will—

I guess I misread that line—

I hope it will not be defeated, because I think we ought to be plain about expressing beforehand what our undoubted intent is.

The reason I fell into that error was because of a practice which has grown up here of voting one way and hoping another. [Laughter.] I thought it had grown to be a habit. Perhaps it is not a habit, but only periodical [Laughter.] My friend the present Senator from Mississippi goes on:

Then if the amendment shall be defeated, I shall then vote for the bill, firmly believing that the mere fact of enabling the cotton goods of the South to reach Japan and China, Manchuria and Korea, with the obliteration of 10,000 miles of ocean transportation, will amount to something like a cent a pound of additional net receipts to every southern planter upon every pound of cotton which he sells to those markets.

Mr. President and Senators, is this the same voice that was raised in protest against a subsidy? It can not be; he would not vote for a bill which provided a subsidy. Perish the thought. "A cent a pound of additional net receipts to every southern planter" rather shocks my sense of circumspection. [Laughter.]

He further says:

I shall vote for the bill, because I believe it will carry Tennessee iron and coal entirely by waterway to a market where coal sells now for $14 a ton, coal that we can get out of the mines at a cost of $1.25 a ton. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will prevail.

So spoke the distinguished Senator from Mississippi a few short years ago.

I hope he can find some comfort in his record. I have no doubt the agility which he seems to have acquired since he came to the Senate of promptly changing his opinions to meet Executive favor and at the same time remaining unruffled in his relations to his fellow Senators is rather more praiseworthy than censurable.

But why should we prolong this discussion further? They have got the shroud all made and the casket built, and they are going to inter this poor little American offspring with great formality on the historic shores of the Potomac River, where it will ever stand as a towering monument of party perfidy and dishonor. Our countrymen will deplore this base surrender to England, and future generations will pay the penalty of our folly.

Mr. President, the other day a bill passed the Senate containing a provision for the remission of tolls on foreign warships visiting the Panama Exposition at San Francisco.

Those favoring the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause in the present bill could not consistently accept the provision in the naval appropriation bill, but they did, whereby it is provided that tolls through the Panama Canal on all vessels of war passing through the canal to or from the Panama-Pacific Exposition are to be remitted, although such an enactment was plainly in contravention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as interpreted by the proponents of this repeal. The treaty does not provide for any discrimination among our customers in the use of the canal, and a nation observing the rules could justly complain if one of its war vessels bound on an urgent mission was compelled to pay tolls while the war vessels of another nation bound to the Panama-Pacific Exposition were passed through the canal free.

If such a remission of tolls does not constitute a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, then why can not the United States remit the tolls on a vessel bound from New York to San Francisco, or on a vessel engaged in our foreign trade? If such a remission by legislative enactment is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, then why argue against giving this right to our own citizens? If the United States, through legislation, can provide for the remitting of tolls through the Panama Canal for one cause, then it can do so for any cause it deems wise without contravention of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality.

That is the language of our compact, and yet we have just discriminated in favor of visitors to the Panama Exposition at San Francisco and no objection has been raised by anyone, and the President will promptly attach his signature to the bill. Subsidies, indeed!

Mr. President, if it had been the intention to include the United States in the term "all nations," then the treaty should have read "so that there shall be no discrimination against or in favor of any nation or its citizens." The fact that "in favor of its citizens" was left out is a powerful argument with me that it never was intended to be put in, either by construction or otherwise.

My honored friend from Illinois yesterday thought I was a little hard on him when I adverted to his fear lest we were about to array the entire world against us.

Mr. LEWIS. No; Mr. President; if I may interrupt my friend——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, the world was against us, anyway, according to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. My objection, if I may be permitted just a word, was that I feared my able friend had left the impression that I had said there was an alliance between the President and England, or that he desired such, in compensation for the repeal of the tolls exemption. It was that particular allusion which the able Senator made that I could not permit to rest without contradiction.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois stands in awe of Great Britain. He admits it. In the course of his very able speech, to which I listened with a great deal of pleasure, when he reaches the point where he is quite overcome by the situation into which we are drifting, he says:

Mr. President, at the threshold of the presentation—this one fact the world must understand—the Panama Canal is the property of America. No nation—no people—can have privileges therein except as granted by the grace and equity of the United States. We are the sovereign proprietors. No other nation on earth can be recognized as having any sovereign right over this canal, its use or operation, and this is addressed to Great Britain.

Great Britain. When we speak of her we pause.

I pause when I speak of her. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator to proceed with the remainder of that dissertation? He will get his reply.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I paused because the Senator asked me to pause. You have a period after the word "pause."

Mr. LEWIS. But the distinguished Senator from Michigan seems to have no period anywhere, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, my friend is in a period of great vexation and doubt, and uses a period only to express it.

Mr. LEWIS. I apologize to the Senator. I do not interrupt him. I will reply to him, and I withhold any further interruption.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator is going to reply, perhaps he had better desist now. I do not want to invite any controversy which will delay this humiliating surrender of any of our rights at Panama.

When we speak of her we pause. * * * We may inquire where the doctrine of retaliation on the part of these nations against us for discrimination against their ships and tonnage would lead us.

Thus spoke my honored friend from Illinois in the very dawn of this discussion.

The inquiry is pertinent. I am not surprised that my able friend from Illinois should be placed upon inquiry.

First, as I see it—

Says the Senator from Illinois—

First, as I see it, to where our commerce would be stricken from their seas; second, it would awaken discordancy between the nations and ourselves and a destruction of harmonious dealings between their people and ours at home. Such an unfortunate sense of disagreement would set in as would lead to conflict at our doorways; and from that there arises things in their magnitude so much greater that war too frequently is the word to characterize their after consequence. Therefore I say, Why should we pause to make a distinction as to whether Great Britain has made a formal protest?

The President of the United States brings this matter here, says the Senator from Illinois.

Sir, I do marvel to some degree that the able Executive did not find it compatible with his sense of propriety to enter with more detail and explanation into the things which were in his apprehension.

The entire world marvels at that. The only thing about which we all seem to be in accord is the marvel that he should do this whole business alone.

Therefore, Mr. President, when I contrast that attitude with this strange exception, I am forced to the conclusion that there was reason so impelling and of a nature so momentous, of a consequence so dire, that, according to the logic of the man, the judgment of the ruler, and the sense of the patriot, it were better, in the language of Bassanio, that he should, "to do a great right, do a little wrong."

Now, Senators, if this is so dire, if the consequences are so far-reaching, if the President has failed to give us light, where did the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] obtain his light? He said he had been literally submerged in a flood of light since he voted in favor of free tolls.

Yet the Senator from Illinois seems to be engulfed in darkness. There is something wrong.

Then I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois when the Chief Executive of this Nation became a ruler? He may—he evidently does—rule your side of the Chamber, but does he also rule this? He is not king or emperor or czar. If he respects the fundamental law from which he derives his short tenure of office, he must know that he is only one of the coordinate departments of the Government. My friend from Illinois is unfortunate in his choice of expression. He must have been thinking of his own relation to his party.

But I, for myself—

Said the Senator from Illinois—

will not hesitate to give what I feel may have been the reasons.

Whose reasons?

The President has not yet taken the Senator from Illinois into his confidence, but he is going to give some of the reasons which moved the President to this action. There is no more fertile intellect in this body than that of the Senator from Illinois. He can always give reasons, and good ones, too. I thought he gave the reasons on the 20th of March for the President's course, and it was to that to which I referred yesterday.

It may be distasteful—

Says the Senator from Illinois—

but I do it; it may not be in consonance with propriety that I enter upon it; it may be questionable according to diplomatic usage that I should detail it; yet, in the words of Hamlet—

I'll cross it though it blast me.

And he did. I do not think he has yet been blasted, but I think his party has. He may be saved from the wreck—I hope he will—but the word "blast" has a powerful and potential meaning in the politics of our country.

I did not mean to misrepresent the honorable Senator, and do not believe I did.

However, when I referred to the visit of the officers of a Japanese battleship then in the harbor of Vera Cruz to Gen. Huerta, at Mexico City, a few months ago, I seem to have touched a sensitive point in my friend's anatomy usually so serene.

He refers to our relations with Japan and Mexico and Mexico's relations with Japan. Then he refers to the seething war upon our border, laying special emphasis upon the word "seething."

Mr. President—

Said the Senator from Illinois—

if we should now, in defiance of the attitude Mexico has taken, or because of some grievance which we feel we have suffered, attempt to intervene in Mexico and march our Army into Mexico, contemplate the European response.

Said the Senator from Illinois:

Hear the world's reply to our threat. England says: "Hold, gentlemen; we have our property here to protect." Germany, with its large possessions, says: "Stay, gentlemen; here are our concessions." France, with her large interests and her investments, says: "Stop, gentlemen; you can not come into Mexico." All in chorus cry out, saying, "Now, since you have started, we will protect our own property. We march our army into Mexico and protect our own by our own."

America says: "Hold, Europe!"

Senators, there we are in battle array. There we are drawn up in solemn phalanx before the god of battle. I did not say it; the honorable Senator from Illinois filed that caveat last March.

I said yesterday that there was an acuteness in the Mexican situation which had prompted the President to seek an ally somewhere in the world that would strengthen his hand and insure his purpose to dethrone the de facto head of the Mexican Government. I think I am right about it. I think that is at the sole foundation of this emergency. One mistake always leads to another. I think that situation precipitated this crisis, and yet I only described the situation as acute; but the Senator from Illinois, before we had put our troops on Mexican soil and before our Navy was in Mexican waters, said:

Hold, Europe! Thus far and no farther; for a doctrine known as the Monroe doctrine, propounded by our founders upon the theory that America would remain ever within America and that Europe or Asia should never come within it, as we should never come within theirs, exists in all its vital principle in America, and our countrymen demand its execution and fulfillment.

That is good, red-blooded ardor. I commend my honorable friend and only wish he had more influence with the head of state, who by accident or design has imperiled the Monroe doctrine by inviting a situation which could have been easily avoided. But listen to these ominous words:

Japan, with her grievance, and already with an alliance with Mexico—

Says the Senator from Illinois—

such an alliance that all Japan, when Huerta's particular representative came to that country, gave him a celebration the like of which was never accorded to any American or Englishman since the foundation of their new dynasty—Japan would promptly seize the Philippine Islands. She would then seize Hawaii. Then, with such conditions pointed out by me, our Army is in Mexico, the canal not finished, no way to have a joinder of our Navy, in what condition would our country be?

That is most deplorable, but even if we lost our Atlantic and Pacific outposts in war, that would be vastly preferable to a cowardly surrender in time of peace.

I turn to consider the attitude of the other nations—

Says the Senator from Illinois—

Russia, with her grievances—she who says she lent aid to the American Union at a time when it was threatened with disunion; she who charges that because of English influence the administration in power during the last 10 years lent its aid to Japan against her, Russia, and brought the United States where it gave not only its sympathy but its financial contribution to Japan against her—Russia, remembering this wrong, carrying it brooding in her bosom, with frowning face, as gloomy as the very aspect of death, having already her smoking forts upon the border of Japan, and now in an offensive and defensive alliance of life and death with Japan, this Russia would not lose her opportunity; and with her grievance now so great that she has no treaty with the United States of either companionship or commercial amity, she would promptly aid Japan by seizing Alaska, at the north, near her borders, to embarrass our armies.

Well, we have now lost Hawaii and the Philippines and Alaska. Because we will follow the President, "right or wrong," we have been despoiled of all our outlying possessions. That is a very serious affair. I can not pass such a statement by without giving it the attention which it richly deserves.

Then the Senator from Illinois goes on to say that the whole world is against us, even—

Central America, bordering the canal, would be furnishing supplies to the European and oriental enemy and supporting their assault. Mr. President, reflect in what desperate condition we would stand; appalling, indeed, to contemplate.

I did not go that far yesterday; my statement was mild; I merely suggested that an acute situation had grown out of our policy toward Mexico which had prompted us to cultivate our ancient foe; that in order to strengthen the hands of Mr. Walter Page, our ambassador at the Court of St. James, we were to be asked to repeal the tolls-exemption law. That is all we can discern through the haze and mystery of our present diplomacy. If the President had given that as the reason for his anxiety, the American people would have rejected it with scorn. No wonder he confined himself to the most glittering generalities; that he asked us to grant his request ungrudgingly, "right or wrong." Sirs, right or wrong indicates the desperate character of his cause.

I have said many times since this debate began that I thought the seeming exigency which gave it birth would have passed away before we reached a vote on the bill. If the administration was not so solicitous about the fate of the Mexican rebels, Carranza and Villa, if the President had given the A B C mediators a free hand at Niagara Falls, the exigency which gave birth to the bill we are now considering would long since have passed away.

How much did the Panama Canal cost? Three hundred and seventy-five million dollars. We still owe on it $134,621,980. Who is going to pay that debt? We have not yet paid for the canal; we still owe this vast sum of money. Who is going to pay it? Why, the American people, of course. Why? Because they own the canal.

No wonder the British foreign office, through Lord Lansdowne, said to Mr. Hay, "When we are relieved, as we are under the new Hay-Pauncefote treaty, from the responsibility of maintaining the neutrality of that canal, we are relieved of about all the responsibility which we formerly assumed." He knew they had no rights under this treaty, for they had no obligations.

How much did the Suez Canal cost? One hundred and twenty-six million dollars; probably a little more. England permitted it to be built by private capital, and then acquired it through subjecting a dependent State to her will.

Great Britain knew of our treaty with New Granada—executed, exchanged, and ratified four years before Mr. Clayton and Mr. Bulwer entered upon their negotiations—which stood for more than half a century as our fundamental right to do what we pleased at the Isthmus of Panama.

Before the Clayton-Bulwer treaty a concession was made to Cornelius Vanderbilt, Joseph L. White, Nathaniel H. Wolf, and their associates for the exclusive right to construct the Nicaragua Canal. Enterprising railroad people have never been unmindful of the value of such a waterway or of its probable effect upon the railroad transportation of the country.

Mr. President, we did agree with Great Britain that that canal should be neutralized, and we will keep our word; but that only means, as I said yesterday, that we will stand apart from the controversies of our customers. I think that is as far as our obligation goes. I believe that was the construction placed upon the word "neutralization" by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. GOFF. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. GOFF. It is in the nature of a suggestion. I have followed with much interest the remarks of the Senator from Michigan in relation to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and to the effect a bill pending in the House would have upon the then existing situation had it been passed by the Senate relative to the Nicaraguan route. I am in full accord with the Senator upon the suggestion that the enactment of that bill into law would have repealed the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The suggestion I make now is this: Conceding that to be true, as I think we must from the decisions of our own Supreme Court, if the position of the President is correct and those who are in full accord with the Executive upon that question, if it plainly appears that the canal-tolls act is in conflict with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, why does not that act tend to repeal the Hay-Pauncefote treaty?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator go beyond the particular clause affected by the legislative act?

Mr. GOFF. I say that if any act repeals any clause of a treaty, under international law it abrogates the entire treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because of his recognized ability as a lawyer and his large experience as a jurist, I am quite willing to accept the construction which the Senator from West Virginia gives to this matter, and we are now placed in the anomalous situation of undertaking to repeal by statute something which died many months ago at the hands of Congress when the tolls bill was passed.

Mr. GOFF. I understand that the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty failed for several reasons, one of the most important of which was that it failed to explicitly repeal the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It did.

Mr. GOFF. Previous to that, through long years England and the United States had virtually by their action recognized the fact, I claim, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was dead. I make that suggestion because from the time of the commencement by De Lesseps to construct the canal down to the time almost of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and especially a communication of Secretary Blaine to the English Government, there had been, because of the recognition of the grant to the French, the acquiescence of the United States Government in the construction of the canal under French management, and with the difficulty subsequent thereto occasioned by the failure of the French company and the reorganized French company, and still the acquiescence on the part of the Government, it tended, impliedly at least and by long recognition of the existing condition of affairs, to create the impression not only through this country but through all others that as a matter of fact the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was abrogated. Now, why our State Department ever revived it has always been a mystery, not only to myself but, it seems, to all others who have studied that international question. The only explanation that suggests itself to my mind is that it would be better to have an explicit abrogation of that matter than, since the Government of the United States built the canal, to have it an open matter that hereafter might haunt us in reference to its management.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am greatly obliged to the Senator from West Virginia. The act to which I referred, which passed the House, had no specific language repealing the treaty. It would have operated ipso facto to do it had the Senate concurred.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Michigan has stated two or three times that the bill to which he referred, if it had finally passed, would have abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Is it not equally true that the passage of a Panama Canal act, if it was in any sense inconsistent with the treaty then in existence, would also abrogate that treaty?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It certainly is true; an act of Congress would abrogate that treaty; but the singular thing about it all is that the Government at that time with practical unanimity held that the free-tolls bill was in perfect harmony with the treaty. This new modern construction of our treaty obligations, which came to us only after the new light had shed itself upon the President of the United States, gives force to the argument now suggested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS]. Two years ago, when we were using a field glass instead of a microscope in our foreign affairs, the two acts harmonized with the purposes of the Government, and I still believe they are not in conflict.

Mr. GOFF. I agree with the Senator from Michigan; but the question I propounded to him is, If it be true that the President is right in his construction of that act, does it not necessarily and logically follow that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is repealed or abrogated?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It does; in other words, if the contention of our friends on the other side of the Chamber is to be taken as the rule of law, then the treaty has already been annulled. I am greatly comforted by the words of the Senator from West Virginia. I know that he has been a member of the Cabinet of a President of the United States in the past and an honored member of the other House; that he has sat upon the Federal bench for many years with credit and honor, and I think I know what very few people perhaps do know about him—that he was the special choice of President McKinley for Attorney General in his first Cabinet. In fact, the late President McKinley told me before he had assumed the duties of his high office that he wanted NATHAN GOFF, of West Virginia, as his Attorney General. The only reason the Senator from West Virginia did not sit at the Cabinet board at the time this controversy arose in its incipient stage was because of his own desire not to do so, and not because he was not wanted by one of the ablest Presidents who has ever graced the White House in the history of this Government, whose memory still pervades every department of the public service, and whose example of kindliness, generosity, and valor is still an inspiration to us all.

But, Mr. President, what of this real "flood of light" that broke so suddenly upon the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and that blinded the Democratic Party to its platform pledges—this "flood of light" that came upon the country the very hour that the President delivered his special message to Congress—where had it been concealed? He carried that "flood of light" all bound up in a little leather case. None escaped between the White House and the House of Representatives. That "flood of light" which was bound up in the President's portfolio fell upon the benighted world in these enlightening and sunlit words:

> We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.
> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

This was the "flood of light" that burst upon the unsuspecting world; this was the overwhelming revelation that came to our friends upon the other side of the Chamber. It caused the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to turn a double back summersault and land squarely upon his feet; it blinded the eyes of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] as it burst in its glory upon his great soul, and he arose forthwith and followed the star to the White House; it struck the giant frame of the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], but made no lasting impression upon his fertile brain. It was great enough to engulf the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], who proclaimed openly its power to change his previous course of action.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, am I to understand that the Senator from Michigan is calling on me now to explain why I changed?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I know why the Senator changed. I know the Senator changed because he felt the piercing glare and considered it was his duty to do so.

Mr. THORNTON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Just as he meets every public emergency. I think none the less of him for it, or of any other Senator who sees the new light; but this light was so carefully confined within the little portfolio of the Chief Executive that I marvel it could be seen with so much precision through the mist of our time by men of mature age. Like the prophets of old, who saw the spirit in the burning bush, this "flood of light" instantly, surprisingly, filled the breasts of those who had dwelt in ignorance and darkness until that moment. Well, Mr. President, I do not know but that I ought to permit them, without further resistance, to lapse into their semiconscious state, with their idol in their arms. I do not know why I should longer attempt to influence the action of the Senate. Nearly every Senator's mind is made up, and we might just as well take the verdict at one time as at another. I think, however, that we are surrendering important national rights which we ought to defend.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to my friend from Missouri with pleasure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senator from Michigan made a remark the import of which was that England in her diplomacy and in her policy always claimed England's full share. That was not the language, but that was the import of the statement. It led me to think of some remarks made by John A. Dix, which I read many years ago and which Mr. Dix made in the year 1845. They are so thoroughly American and so refreshing at this time that I ask permission of the Senator from Michigan to read them into his remarks.

Rapid and widespread as has been the progress of the latter, we have never sought to interfere with it. She holds one-third of the North American continent. She has established her dominion in the Bermudas, the West Indies, and in Guiana, on the South American continent. She holds Belize, on the Bay of Yucatan, in North America, with a district of about 14,000 square miles, if we may trust her own geographical delineations. We see her in the occupation of territories in every quarter of the globe, vastly, inordinately extended, and still ever extending herself. It is not easy to keep pace with her encroachments. A few years ago the Indus was the western boundary of her Indian empire. She has passed it. She has overrun Afghanistan and Beloochistan, though I believe she has temporarily withdrawn from the former. She stands at the gates of Persia. She has discussed the policy of passing Persia and making the Tigris her western boundary in Asia. One stride more would place her upon the shores of the Mediterranean, and her armies would no longer find their way to India by the circumnavigation of Africa. Indeed, she has now, for all Government purposes of communication except the transportation of troops and munitions of war, a direct intercourse with the East. Her steamers of the largest class run from England to Alexandria; from Alexandria there is a water communication with Cairo, some 60 miles; from Cairo it is but eight hours overland to Suez, at the head of the Red Sea; from Suez her steamers of the largest class run to Aden, a military station of hers at the mouth of the Red Sea; from Aden to Ceylon, and from Ceylon to China. She is not merely conquering her way back from Hindostan; she has raised her standard beyond it. She has entered the confines of the Celestial Empire. She has gained a permanent foothold within it; and who that knows her can believe that pretexts will long be wanting to extend her dominion there? Though it is for commerce mainly that she is thus adding to the number and extent of her dependencies, it is not for commerce alone. The love of power and extended empire is one of the efficient principles of her gigantic efforts and movements. No island, however remote, no rock, however barren, on which the cross of St. George has once been unfurled is ever willingly relinquished, no matter how expensive or inconvenient it may be to maintain it. She may be said literally to encircle the globe by an unbroken chain of dependencies. Nor is it by peaceful means that she is thus extending herself. She propagates commerce, as Mohammedanism propagated religion, by fire and sword. If she negotiates, it is with fleets and armies at the side of her ambassadors, in order, to use the language of her diplomacy, "to give force to their representations." She is essentially and eminently a military power, unequaled on the sea and unsurpassed on the land. Happily, the civilization which distinguishes her at home goes with her and obliterates some of the bloody traces of her march to unlimited empire.

Mr. President, many of the predictions in that statement have been realized; and, while we are constantly spending our time dwelling upon the fraternity of the two nations, it is well enough to turn back to the pages of history and consider the past in connection with the present.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator from Missouri. I think, however, that much of Great Britain's progress in the world has been made because of the very scientific system of diplomacy which she has formulated during the ages of her dominance. I am very glad indeed that we have an English-speaking people to the north of us. If Canada can not be a part of the United States, I am glad that it is inhabited by a fine race of people. But, Mr. President, I do not like to see our domestic policy influenced so largely by either our neighbors on our north or our neighbors on our south. If it had not been for the internal conflict now going on in Mexico I do not believe this proposition would have ever emanated from the brain of the President of the United States; and if it had not been for the activities of the officers of the Canadian Government, I do not believe England's interest would have been quickened in the present contest for commercial advantage. The countries of the Western Hemisphere will soon stand face to face with the necessity of dealing with one another as Americans. The Mediterranean is a world sea lying in the Temperate Zone, amid an ancient civilization, and our southern basin is destined to be a world sea, now that a canal pierces the Isthmus connecting the Eastern and Western Hemispheres by direct and rapid communication.

Senators, will you bear with me while I recapitulate what I have taken altogether too long to say? England had no right on the Mosquito Coast or in British Honduras under her treaty with Spain. She has hovered around that narrow strip of land connecting the two continents of North and South America like a vulture in anticipation of an opening between the two oceans.

The treaty between the United States and Great Britain formulated by Mr. Clayton was not intended to affect us at Panama. President Arthur and Mr. Frelinghuysen and Mr. Blaine treated it as a nullity; President Hayes and President Garfield called any waterway connecting the two oceans at the Isthmus part of our coast line.

Every time we approached the question of the construction of a canal across Central America, England became active in its vicinity; and if she could not influence us by kindly offices, she did not hesitate to provoke our concern; the dust was sure to rise somewhere just enough to complicate the situation and assure us that it was very desirable to have her friendship.

There was no inhibition against us at Panama. The old treaty had no reference to a canal built at a different point than that described in the instrument. When the American public asserted itself, the British foreign office and our State Department promptly adjusted themselves to the new situation. Our insistence forced her to give up everything except what we were willing to give to every other country—neutralization and equality of tolls among our customers; that is all.

Mr. President, if that represents all her rights in equity and good conscience, if that is all she has under the law of nations, then we are not called upon to make this sacrifice to-day. If the exemption clause is repealed, if we bow to the suggestion of Mr. Innes, the British consul; if we comply with the wishes of Mr. Borden, the Canadian premier; if we reverse the policy of this Government solemnly and almost unanimously decreed less than two years ago, difficulties will multiply and our foreign relations will become sadly awry. And if we should ever attempt to reimpose this exemption from tolls, we will find this verdict you have to-day written emblazoned in letters of living light at every angle of our national experience.

O Mr. President, it is too far-reaching, too important to future generations of our countrymen to be thus surrendered on the mere ipse dixit of the President of the United States.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. A few moments ago the Senator made the statement that if it had not been for the internal difficulties in Mexico we never would have heard of this proposition to repeal the free-tolls clause. I do not know how others may feel, but I certainly should be very much interested in the discussion of any possible relation between the little revolution in Mexico and the regulation of our tolls a thousand miles or more south of Mexico.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What I said I repeat to the Senator from Minnesota, that the first time this subject was ever mentioned to any committee of Congress it was mentioned by the President to the Foreign Relations Committee, then considering the Mexican situation at its most acute stage; and when it was suggested that the hands of our ambassador in London might be strengthened by such a course, I for one, and there were others, protested against it.

Mr. CLAPP. But what had our ambassador in London to do with the relation which we sustained to Mexico? That is what interests me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Minnesota knows that Great Britain has a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with Japan, does he not?

Mr. CLAPP. I have heard so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I happened to be in London when it was promulgated, and knew something of the sentiment that prompted it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator knows of the unusual friendship existing between those two Governments. The Senator knows that Japan at one time, not very far distant, became greatly interested in the Mexican situation. The Senator knows that the officers of a Japanese battleship paid a visit to Gen. Huerta in Mexico City for a week; and it was at that moment when the administration seemed to be perplexed and impressed with the necessity of finding support for his Mexican policy, just at the time when he asked us to repeal this law, "right or wrong," in support of the foreign policy of the administration, adding, "I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequences if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure."

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I still fail to see any connection. Does the Senator mean to imply that in order to offset an alliance based upon a treaty between England and Japan we are making this surrender to England as a measure of national protection?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, that is a very blunt inquiry. It is very characteristic of the Senator from Minnesota. I am no alarmist, but I think the answer to his question can be found in the message of the President of the United States just read.

Mr. CLAPP. Then we have reached the point in national decadence where we buy peace? Is that it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I dislike to admit it, but I can not find any other motive for this course.

Mr. CLAPP. I thought there must be some powerful motive that acted on us.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] very appropriately says, we do not know what is the full price of the friendship we are now buying.

Mr. CLAPP. No; but are we buying friendship?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If we are not buying friendship, we are taking a great deal of pains to cultivate ill will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume that it has occurred to the Senator from Michigan as a remarkable circumstance that England, which has always protected her subjects everywhere—going to the extent, I think, of raising 5,000 troops and spending millions of money to rescue a single English citizen in Abyssinia a few years ago—has been quiescent over the murder of an English citizen in Mexico. Has the Senator any suggestion to make as to why England has not, in her usual way, demanded reparation for that affront and the murder of that English citizen?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; but I believe that if the truth were known the British Government has been assured redress for that wrong if she will "watchfully wait" an appropriate time for vengeance.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, that is a very serious charge against the English Government. That involves the proposition that they would abate their protection and the avenging of a wrong to an English citizen for the commercial benefits to be derived from our surrender of our sovereignty in the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, far be it from me to exalt the commercial virtues of England. They have a way entirely their own. Commerce has driven her flag into every port of the world, and the ambitions of her rulers have planted it permanently at the very outposts of civilization. From the days of Cromwell to the rule of George IV her diplomacy and her commerce have sailed the seas together; commercial expansion has prompted her to conquest, scattered her soldiers into every clime, and impoverished her people by ruinous competition. Yet the strength of her Government and the permanence of her plans challenge the admiration of the world.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me further, I think we can find a way out of this dilemma and save the national honor of England and America, and that is to recognize that the underlying spirit that is demanding this repeal consists of the railroad interests of the country. That frees us from the humiliating spectacle of two great nations bartering national honor upon a commercial basis.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the communications of railroad people have been quite unanimous.

Mr. CLAPP. It is the only logical reason you can find for it which preserves the honor of the two nations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The President favored the Panama tolls exemption in his campaign; and in the speech of acceptance which he delivered to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and his associates he thought that exemption was not going quite far enough to rehabilitate our merchant marine. He said in that speech that the device which we had formulated was merely paltry; that it went only halfway, and did not quite assure the establishment of an appropriate merchant marine. Then he said in his address to Congress last March:

> The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood.

It was not everywhere questioned and misunderstod in the campaign when he was running for President, nor when he faced Senator JAMES and his associates in his speech of acceptance. It was not supposed to be misunderstood during the first year of his administration. It was not supposed to be so all-powerful until he found that his policy in Mexico was not working as he had imagined it would; until there was activity upon the part of other countries in Mexican affairs; until the attitude of Sir Lionel Carden, the British ambassador to Mexico, had excited the President's suspicions, for which he was called to London, supposedly for discipline.

Has not the State Department declined to furnish the Senate with the correspondence touching this matter? Are not the resolutions of Senators asking for information buried in the Committee on Foreign Relations? The President wants to hedge this matter about with mystery which no one can understand because of the "nearer" and "more delicate" questions, which he "will not know how to solve" if he does not get this repeal.

There is no assurance in anything he has said that he will know how to solve those questions if he does get repeal. I am suspicious that the next step will be to comply with some wish of Japan, the British ally in the Orient, before we can have absolute assurance of peace.

The words read by the Senator from Missouri regarding the matchless character of the British Empire thrill all English-speaking people; but we are American Senators. We hold no commission from any other Government. We are American Senators, with our duty to our own. We are fighting for American rights. The Senator from Missouri, in what he has quoted, speaks of the "white circle of British Empire." Why, Mr. President, it has been the boast of England for a hundred years and more that she has a country upon which the sun never sets. But so have we. Our acquisition of the Aleutian Isles in Russian America gave us a country upon which the sun never sets. While the Aleutian fisherman, lulled by the shades of approaching night, is pulling his canoe toward the shore, the woodchopper of Maine is beginning to wake the forest echo with the stirring music of the ax. We have an empire upon which the sun never sets. It is the glory of the generation in which we live that wherever we have gone with our high ideals, intelligence, moderation, good citizenship, virtue, and patriotism have followed our flag. If we yield now our sovereign rights on the Isthmus of Panama, without reason, to placate a country from which we were obliged to revolt in order to enjoy our freedom, who is to say what the next contribution to amity will be?

Already Senators on the other side have a policy, which you are nursing, to set the Philippines free. How are we to know but that is a part of the sacrifice we are now making? Does the President contemplate a British and Japanese protectorate over the Philippine Islands? How do we know that we are not to be despoiled of Hawaii, which shines like a beacon light on the highway to the Orient? How do we know but that Porto Rico, that glistening pearl at the very entrance to the canal, is not to go to some stronger power in the interest of that "larger" peace which the President of the United States is so anxious to exemplify?

Mr. President, we ought not to yield to this demand. Poets and authors and philosophers have for hundreds of years contemplated the construction of a canal across the Isthmus. Goethe, the bard of Weimar, nearly a hundred years ago said he wished he might live to see the day when a canal would be constructed across the Isthmus of Suez, to be controlled by Great Britain. Goethe foresaw the dreams of navigators in his moments of fancy, and nearly a century ago predicted the construction of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama and expressed the wish that he might live to see the Mexican Gulf and the Pacific Ocean united under the direction and control of our Government and a junction made between the Danube and the Rhine by the Government of the fatherland. But in the wildest flights of his poetic fancy he could never have conceived the possibility that a canal would be constructed across the Isthmus by the American Government and then, just as we were to celebrate its triumphant completion, temporary officers of the American Government would turn it over to the joint management and control of our greatest rival among the nations of the earth.

O my fellow Senators, do not commit this wrong against your country. There is no exigency which demands it. There is no condition in the wide world that calls for such a sacrifice. Vexation and temporary fear will soon pass away, but the act that you are passing will stand as a perpetual monument to the singular folly of our times.

Mr. President, the Senate has been marvelously indulgent with me to-day. Never before have I trespassed upon your good nature so long, and I little thought I should do so now. But, Senators, it is due entirely to the importance of my theme. Is there no one to stay this wrong? From the bottom of my heart I wish the consummation of this outrage could be thwarted before it is too late.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Michigan is not so fatigued that he thinks he should take some rest or respite by leaving the Chamber, I prefer that he remain in the Chamber, as I should like to make some reference to a few of his observations; and lest I should misquote him or disclose a misunderstanding, I prefer that he should be present, that he might correct me should I fall into error.

Mr. President I have been greatly interested in listening to the very copious presentation of the able senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] touching the question of Panama tolls. I say "touching" the question—occasionally touching it; and touching it in such manner that it will hereafter be known to have been touched by such a hand as he always discloses wherever he wields a blade.

I have been at a loss, however, doubtlessly due to the obtuseness for which I must express great regret, to understand whether the able Senator has meant his speech as a display of humor or one of serious statesmanship. I have observed his party colleagues on the other side surround him and, under the proper tutelage of his excellent colleague the junior Senator from Michigan, they had their risibilities awakened at certain stated periods, when an evidence of humor ripples forth like to that adjusted by the claquers at a vaudeville performance to the first entrance of a new and untried artist. Whether all of that was due merely to a desire to give to the distinguished Senator from Michigan an understanding that his remarks were having great effect and as being humorous, or whether it was intended to indicate that his colleagues were exceedingly amused at the references made by the able Senator to other Members of the Chamber, including myself, is to me more or less a doubt. I can not say how the speech of the able Senator from Michigan is to be taken.

As the Senator referred very fully to the attitude of one of his distinguished predecessors, Gen. Cass, a Senator from Michigan, who, upon a previous occasion, had an important part in the debate in the Senate upon the question of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and upon the relations of our country with Central America, and it being true that at that particular time there was a Senator from Illinois occupying the floor and taking a very active part in that debate, I fancied that my very able friend from Michigan threw out his lariat in a vocabularic circle and dragged me from my obscure place in the Senate to be the victim of his animadversions, that he might possibly duplicate in history that other debate between Cass, of Michigan, and Douglas, of Illinois. He should have been more merciful; for while, by the gift of heaven, it is his quality to duplicate at any time the capacity of his distinguished predecessor, Cass, of Michigan, I am unhappily so limited that I can not occupy the place of the distinguished opponent from Illinois, Douglas, but must be as one who dares but to latch the shoes.

I do not understand what the able Senator from Michigan means when, from his very exalted station, he seriously charges the President of his country with having gravely and deliberately entered into some understanding with a foreign country to surrender the rights of American citizens for some imaginary protection, which only in the flaming imagination and heated discussion of the distinguished Senator from Michigan exists in the fancy of some pending alliance.

I do not fancy for a moment that so patriotic a gentleman as the able Senator from Michigan could have seriously made those allusions either to-day or yesterday in the opening of his able speech, because it was well prepared, carefully thought and arranged, with historical quotations and introductions, indicative of vast labor and industry, for which the Senator must always be praised. But, further on, yesterday, when that intimation was made I assumed to invite my able friend to the fact that he made an unconscious utterance, I will say, through overflowing expression rather than reflection of intellect.

But to-day the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] having had his attention likewise directed to the full meaning of such assertions gravely asked the able Senator from Michigan, who is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, if he really meant to intimate that it is his belief that the President of the United States has entered into an understanding in the form of some shape of agreement with England to yield up the rights of American citizens in the United States in turn for something not yet defined, to be granted by that English Government. Then the able Senator from Michigan by his answer seems to be thoroughly impressed that something of the kind must have existed; otherwise, said he, the President would not have indulged in expressions that have found their way to the Senate in his address to both Houses of Congress upon the questions of the repeal.

I heard the able Senator in his speech say that at a meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee—and I am now referring to what the able Senator said yesterday in his remarks upon the floor of the Senate—that at some meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee, of which he is a member—representing capacity which Michigan may well take credit—he said that in his position as a member he had occasion, if I did not misunderstand him, to be in the presence of the President of the United States, who was either before that committee at its session or having that committee before him, and that previous to that particular occasion there had been no allusion to the question of the repeal of the tolls; but that in his presence there was a cable or telegram handed to the President of the United States; that this telegram or cable was opened by the President, a part of it read by the President, and the able Senator from Michigan deduces that the contents of that message was the inducing power which impelled the President thereupon and immediately to make some concession of an ignoble and contemptuous kind in asking of his Nation that it surrender the sovereign rights of American citizens to yield an accommodation of something implied within that mystic, mysterious, and undisclosed message.

I can understand very easily how, upon a rostrum before the voters of Michigan, intoxicated with the genial presence of the able Senator, they would applaud any expression he may bring forth, and that before such a body as that the able Senator might make such expression and not feel the responsibility of the utterance, feeling that his constituency would merely have their curiosity tickled and their pride appeased, but in no wise their convictions impressed by that form of recital.

But, unhappily, the records of this Chamber disclose that any expression of any man carrying ambassadorial power from a sovereign State is embalmed in some form of perpetuity and finds its way into the recorded annals of this celebrated and historic assembly, and in after days is to be read by men who must read those utterances with all the solemnity and conviction communicated by the position from which these expressions came.

Mr. President, Senators elected by their respective States to this body occupy the highest altitude that compliment or honor from any State may confer. They ought not to lightly indict the head of their Government with having made surrender of the great rights of the American people upon so slight a reason and for so small a cause as the fright and terror induced by the contents of a cablegram.

Shall the able Senator from Michigan be content that in after days upon the responsibility of his eminent position he shall bear the consequences of a legitimate criticism that will come from the reflective sense of our country when it is recalled that gravely in his station and high position he has made this charge against the President of his American country?

For what would such a surrender be made? What object would the President have? What service to himself? What service to his country? What theory of freedom, what purpose of nation could be served by any American entering upon so contemptuous an attitude, making so dishonorable a surrender of his own country?

What is there in the history of this man Woodrow Wilson, of his ancestors, of his birth, of his breeding, of his life, of his public and private conduct, that would license any man, however free in fancy, burning in imagination or copious of rhetorical observation, to gladden narrow spirits about him by making such accusations? What is there, I must ask of the able Senator, in all the surroundings of that man which would justify any man charging him with a nature so craven, with a quality so base, as could have done such a thing as the able Senator charges against the President of the United States?

I am sure, therefore, that my very learned and distinguished friend meant to be humorous. That it was not his intention to have his speech taken seriously. That it was one of his excursions into the field of wit and humor. That being encouraged by the constant breaking forth of cheery smiles, globular mutterings, and explosions of joy on the part of his colleagues he was urged further on quite as a romping deer might be as he rushes along a stream that ripples against the bank and then has met ultimately his destruction on rocks or drowning in the gush of waters.

I know the distinguished Senator from Michigan. As he said yesterday our acquaintance began in service in the House, my service an humble one and his, as he has himself certified, with such distinguished quality and elevating magnificence as to bring him the confidence of Presidents of the United States. To him there was whispered every thought which the President had even as to the making of Cabinets and the shaping of policies and the fate of the country. Those things were not mine to enjoy, but it was mine to enjoy the sweet and simple disposition of the able Senator from Michigan, the fertile quality he ever possesses in the form of imagination, the genial manner in which he dismisses all differences between fact and assertion, and the accommodating spirit that ever justifies him in a mere trope and simile of rhetoric without regard to the fundamental facts upon which it may be constructed.

Now, let no man assume for a moment that I am speaking in condemnation. I confess to have something of envy, that I am not gifted in such quality that I could thus charm and entertain surroundings with these versatile qualifications. I am limited to a condition where I must recognize in a solemn assemblage like this my disqualification to excel in these airy excursions. I must be content to and pinion myself, as it were, to the ground. But the able Senator from Michigan is content to draw from the flaming armory of his imagination such things as will give entertainment to his constituents who may not have the knowledge that facts are to the contrary.

Now, I speak seriously to my friend. I speak seriously because I can not feel that his speech was intended to be seriously taken by the great American audience who must here listen, and by the great State of Michigan as she speaks through the voice of her distinguished representative. I know my learned friend in his quiet moments has the tranquillity of the humming bird sipping dewdrops from the tulip, yet in such hours as we have just seen him, lashing himself about as the Ethiopian lion that devours all in its track and crunches his jaws over everything that opposes him, but despite these extremes in conduct, and far distances of latitude in both manner and speech, a middle ground can sometimes be reached upon a basis of a personal responsibility. Where, I ask my distinguished and able friend, the senior Senator from Michigan, will he take the middle ground of responsibility for having had read to-morrow morning from the great newspaper sources of this country by the millions and millions of citizens of his own Nation that their country had been surrendered by the President of the United States to England and the sovereign rights in the property of America, and her privileges as a Republic have been bartered for something which the Senator would imply was contained in the undisclosed provisions of some cable that frightened the President of the United States to make this surrender brazenly before the world? What responsibility will my distinguished and able friend take in the middle ground before Europe, that has not, as he says, too much affection for us at best, when it reads with contemptuous smile to-morrow morning in the cable dispatches that the learned Senator for many years a Member of the House and in the secrets of the Foreign Relations Committee, honored in his place as a Member of the Senate of the United States and a member of the Foreign Relations Committee here, yet in that position confesses to the whole world that he has convictions within him which justify the accusation that his President, the head of his Nation, has surrendered his country—America—to the demand of England; and all for a thing which he sees not, hears not, knows not, but in the imagination that knows no limitation flashes forth in accusation. Surely my able friend did not mean that speech seriously.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I am not, Mr. President, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. I am not able to see from my point of view the justification of any member of the Foreign Relations Committee detailing what he knew was a personal conversation between the President of the United States and that committee. I would fear if I did such as that that I would drive that Executive into fear of every man coming into his presence with any form of confidence, and I would likewise discourage him in his incentive to be frank with the committee, lest by doing so and having his remarks misconstrued suffer that misconstruction to be put forth before the world as a confession from the mouth of the Executive himself.

Mr. President, the President of the United States is not permitted by our rules to appear upon this floor and respond to any Senator who may by his allusion place the President in this unjust and unenviable position. Nor can any Senator in the President's behalf reply for him, because no Senator can know what the President had really said, unless that Senator was likewise present at this gathering, and he would be amenable to the same form of condemnation of revealing those confidences and be placed in the same category of the one who first perpetrated the offense.

Now, I must say I stated my position on this tolls question as well as I could when I opened the debate here on this floor with an amendment which I tendered, having for its object authorizing the President to grant exemptions to ships whenever there was such exaction by railroads as would justify it to prevent monopoly.

If I believed, Mr. President, that any President of the United States had merely for the purpose of serving some national and foreign rival of my country yielded to that accommodation without any reason of justice to my own people and welfare to my own Nation, I would not only decline to support him without regard to what party he may be aligned, but I would denounce him in any public presence where I was honored with an audience. No appellation of Democrat or Republican could rescue him and no privilege, personal or political, could give him refuge against my indignant judgment.

Therefore, Mr. President, there is neither foundation—in fact, there is no excuse in parliamentary privilege for the assertions of the distinguished and able Senator. I must insist, therefore, that those observations were intended by him rather in the sense of a figure of speech than as an assertion and accusation against the President of his own country.

If there shall be a reference made to any surrender or arrangement between this country and England for anything, let us have a frank understanding as to when it occurred.

The able Senator refers to Russia and her grievance, and right he is. Russia seems to have a grievance, and that she does recall the days when she offered her services to the Union, and that she has likewise been offended because of the attitude of our country subsequently against her. We all saw that under the administration of the party of my distinguished friend from Michigan, when Japan was at war with Russia, America offended Russia. Does not history record that it was the Republican administration, through the influence of England, which lent its aid specifically to Japan against Russia? Will it be lost sight of that the only alliance that was made with England in any business or governmental transaction within the memory of men sitting here was that conducted by a Republican administration touching both the affairs of China and Japan?

Then, if these things are to be condemned, as condemned they should be, let the able Senator recall that the only recorded event is that which was consummated by his own administration.

Now, when my able friend says that the President was alarmed with the situation in Mexico and the conduct of Huerta and did nothing but falter and blunder, I ask him what other attitude would he have had the President take than the one which he did. President Taft, the predecessor of President Wilson, had refused to recognize Huerta. President Taft had taken the step in behalf of this Republic which President Wilson himself merely followed. Where was the vice in the Democratic President doing that which was the virtue on the part of President Taft? I am unable to see it.

Then, I say to the Senator from Michigan, what course would he have taken? When a Member of the House to which he alludes, referring to his own distinguished service, to which I grant my certificate, likewise, as being distinguished, able, and of effect, there was an effort made by certain portions of this Government to precipitate the Nation in war with Spain over Cuba. Did not the able Senator from Michigan then work against it, vote against it, and serve against it upon the theory that it was an unnecessary war and a ruthless destruction of the young men of this country and would be inhuman, as it was un-American and un-Christian?

Is there any difference as to the attitude to Mexico and the position the President is now occupying to the sons of his own country, as he seeks to save their lives and preserve the integrity of Christianity and the honor of American justice in his own Republic? Therefore, where is that "vacillating" and what my friend calls an awkward and inexcusable course of blunders on the part of the President of the United States, because he restrains war?

Mr. President, I conclude with the suggestion I rose to make, to call the Senator's attention that he had indulged in observations which I am sure he could not have intended seriously.

Mr. President, I understood from the Senator from Michigan sincerely that there has never been made a mention of the repeal of this tolls by the President until the Mexican imbroglio was upon the community and the President's presence before the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. President, if the question were new it would justify some observations of a little different character from that which must only be indulged now. The whole theory of the repeal of tolls, as I understand it, was in order that the canal might be maintained and maintained by the charges upon all those using that waterway. When the Senator from Michigan calls the attention of the country that $134,000,000 of outstanding bonds are upon that canal and still unpaid, and that many more millions are still to be due, I ask him in what way shall you pay that debt if you shall not have the canal pay for its own obligations? Will you levy a direct tax upon your neighbors in Michigan and make them pay for the canal, when the obligation could be paid for by the users? I do not understand that the President of the United States goes any further in his object.

Mr. President, having made that observation, I now turn to what the Senator said concerning myself. The Senator said that I in a speech on this floor intimated that there was great terror of England. I invite the able Senator's attention that no such utterance was made by me. I never at any time intimated that I had any terror of England. I think if England could have had anyone in this Chamber speaking in her behalf or hearing in her behalf, they would report home that there was one thing in which England need stand in terror, and that was the senior Senator from Michigan. No one could hear the senior Senator from Michigan without realizing the furies he summons up when he speaks.

He says I referred in my speech to that which would "blast" and that some one will be "blasted." I beg to recall the attention of my able friend that there need be no source from which anyone need fear blasting so much as from his distinguished capacity when his trumpet blows and the sound from the bassoon goes forth from his attuned lungs. All the country stands in terror lest either their patience or their capacity of endurance should be blasted with one single bugle call from the senior Senator from Michigan.

Blasted! No; when I used that expression I did not refer to tolls. If my able friend will read my speech, I referred to that portion of the President's speech where he said, referring to those "nearer issues," the foreign policy, in which I spoke of what he must have meant by the expression "those nearer issues." These I said I would cross if it blasted me, using the phrase of Hamlet. I may quote the words wrongly—I referred then to what the President meant, and I called the attention of the country to that which I now repeat and bring to the attention of the Senator. That the President called attention, no doubt, to that helpless state this country had been put in by the policies of the Republican administration, by which it was compelled for a while to parley and play with the emergencies until it could fit itself with equipment that it might defend itself in honor and in strength. I alluded to the policy of the Republican administration precipitating the Philippine Islands as a doctrine of conquest upon us, which the distinguished Senator from Michigan correctly alluded to a few moments past as he closed his speech, with the beautiful peroration when he referred to our "subjects" in the Philippine Islands.

I would not mar the beauty of the wonderful figure of my friend from Michigan. It will be recited in the school exercise orations. Orators will adopt it as they have those perfections of Webster's reply to Hayne and the observations of Blaine upon Conkling, but I allude to the fact that my able friend does not hesitate to speak of these people just as the administration had made them, as the "subjects" of this Government. So if I did refer to the President of the United States in my remarks as the chief ruler of the country, I now animadvert that the one propriety possible was that if there are there subjects created by the distinguished Senator's administration, there must be a ruler over them.

Then I did say the precipitancy of the Philippine Islands upon this country, with all the burdens it entailed and the dangers it threatened and the consequences of the future, the unseen and immeasurable, placed this country at such a disadvantage that, coupled with other things, with the grievances which we had brought upon ourselves, compelled, no doubt, the President to mean in that expression that was somewhat mysterious and not fully clarified that we pause to consider our situation; that if any conflict with Mexico was to come we take methods and time to such preparation as would enable us to defend the Nation in honor and maintain the country in victory—a proper Navy and Army—sufficient for the defense of our possessions and our country.

The able Senator seems to have wholly misapprehended both the theory of my remarks and their expression, and as he has my speech before him and has referred to it this morning, of course that will show that that which I say now was the exact purport of my utterance then.

Mr. President, I shall pass by the pleasant allusion of my beloved friend touching the description he gave of that horror which my countenance portrayed when I came to the expression "we pause." I assure the Senator I will now give a thorough definition to that meaning. Differing from my able friend, I will pause; I will find a place where I can with propriety make that pause; and I pause at that point to invite my able friend from Michigan to contemplate if he does not wish to revise the observations, which, unfortunately, came from the copiousness of utterance and not from the reflection of judgment, when, in response to the Senator from Minnesota, and at his own deliberation on the day before he left the country with the conviction that from himself, the able Senator and eminent spokesman of Michigan, he charges the President of the United States with having no object to serve in whatever he undertook but the surrender of his own country, the ignominy of his own fellow citizens, and the dishonor of his own Republic. I invite him that he contemplate the effect of his charge, that he consider the full strength of the insinuation, and in his place at the proper time confess that which was no doubt his object, to demonstrate himself a wit and a humorist, who provoked the risibilities of his side in laughter and mirth, as he might the admiration, though sometimes the wonderment and amazement, of this side. I warn him that it is not always wise, in order to tickle "the ears of the groundlings," that we "make the judicious grieve."

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is temporarily engaged in a committee meeting; and at his request I send to the desk a copy of an amendment which he proposes, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the text of the committee amendment by adding thereto the following words:

And Congress hereby asserts that the United States has the unrestricted right to regulate the use of the Panama Canal by its citizens and commerce as it may at any time deem wise and proper.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, as I stated this morning, when the diplomatic correspondence relating to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was furnished to the Senate by the State Department, a few weeks since, two letters were omitted. I am advised by the Secretary of State that these two letters were not in the possession of the department at that time. One is a letter from Mr. Hay to Mr. Choate under date of August 5, 1901. The other is a letter to Col. Hay from Mr. Choate under date of January 15, 1901. I ask that both may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN EMBASSY,
London, SW., January 15, 1901.

MY DEAR COL. HAY: As I telegraphed you on Friday last, Lord Lansdowne had named yesterday for an informal and unofficial conference about the Senate amendments to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which I had suggested in my note to him of January 4. I told him at the outset that I was wholly uninstructed; that I was in no way authorized to negotiate; that my instructions had been to present to him the amendments and to express the hope that they would be found acceptable by his Government; but that so much dust had been thrown about the matter by the press and so many things misrepresented that I thought it would be well for both of us, before he took up the amendments for serious consideration, that we should have an informal and unofficial talk, not to be made matter of record, but strictly confidential. He thought that nothing could be better or more advisable, and the conversation proceeded on that basis. I told him that my object was to clear the situation and to ascertain if practicable what, if any, obstacles he found in the way of accepting the amendments. I told him that I had repeatedly seen it stated that the Senate had assumed, by its mere vote, to supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and much criticism had been cast upon them for so doing; that, on the contrary, the Senate was acting strictly within its constitutional province and in its ordinary way in amending the treaty; and that whenever a treaty was negotiated under our Constitution it was with the knowledge on both sides that it must be submitted to the Senate for its consent and approved and be confirmed by two-thirds of that body. He seemed interested in this and said there had been an idea that they had undertaken, by their own vote, to supersede a treaty. I told him that I had also often seen it charged that the Senate was actuated by a spirit of hostility to Great Britain; that, on the contrary, I believed that its course had been dictated by no such spirit, but by a high sense of public duty and in the belief that what they did was required by the best interest of the United States, and was without any injustice or injury to Great Britain.

I called his attention to the components of the great majority vote of 65, that it included the Senators very friendly to the President and to the support of his administration, and that it was quite impossible that men of the character who gave that vote for the amendments could have been governed by any but patriotic and honorable motives. He said he gladly accepted my opinion on the motives of the Senate and their freedom from any unfriendliness to Great Britain as final and satisfactory. I told him further that, so far as could be judged from what had appeared in the press since the vote, the action of the Senate met with large support in the community, where there was a deep-seated conviction that the canal ought to be built, controlled, and managed as an American canal, but for the free and equal use of all nations upon the same terms; and that I had hoped he would come to the conclusion that the treaty, both in its original shape and as amended, accomplished that purpose and nothing more. I told him also that I thought it was the general sentiment at home that if the United States were going to expend a great sum like £40,000,000 or £50,000,000 in constructing the canal, for the equal benefit of all mankind, their own interests and safety should be carefully guarded, and I hoped he would find that the amendments were properly adapted to that purpose, as the Senate obviously intended. We talked over the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and he agreed with me that it involved a general agreement on both sides that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had been outgrown and was wholly inapplicable to the present situation and needs of the country and the world. We then took up the Senate amendments, and I asked him to tell me what objection occurred to him, so far as he had examined them, to their acceptance by Great Britain; and it soon transpired, as I thought and as I had expected, that the Davis amendment was the chief stumbling block, and I think that if that could be arranged there would be no great difficulty about the others. He said his objection to that was that it gave to the United States, at any time and for any reason which in its own judgment made it necessary for the defense of the United States, to deneutralize the canal by departing from all the stipulations of the five foregoing clauses; even in time of peace, on the pretense or belief that it was necessary for the defense of the United States, it would enable us to close the canal against all nations even, and to do all or any of the things that are prohibited by these five clauses; that it would, at any rate in case of war, shut out the vessels of the enemy from the use of the canal, and this would be a very wide departure from the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I asked him what his Government had intended by the use of the same words in the Suez Canal treaty, and suggested that they certainly could not have intended, by their use there, any such fanciful meaning as he had suggested. He said, well, there was a very wide difference between the circumstances of the Suez Canal and the proposed Nicaragua Canal.

First. That the Nicaragua Canal was going to be very remote from the territory of the United States, which was very different from the relation of the Suez Canal to Egypt. This consideration, he said, is perhaps not so very important, in which I concurred; but then he placed his finger on the sticking point, calling attention to article 11 of the Suez treaty, which provided "that the measures which shall be taken for securing the defense of Egypt," and so forth, "shall not interfere with the free use of the canal," and that there were no such words or qualification in the Senate amendments. I told him that although that phrase was not adopted in the Senate amendments, there was the express prohibition in article 7 of the amendment against fortifications, even more explicitly than in the Suez treaty. I called his attention to the gross misstatements which had been made about the repeal of that provision by the amendments, and that it remained absolutely intact, and was obvious from the fact that the Davis amendment specifically referred to the five preceding numbered sections, and could not possibly apply to the subsequent fortification clause. He said that he was no jurist, but he feared that it would nevertheless be somewhat impaired by the breaking down of the first five clauses. He spoke of the possibility in the case provided for in the Davis amendment, of disembarking troops and munitions of war on the canal, and guns, perhaps, and wondered whether that would not be fortification. At any rate, it might be doubtful. I told him that I thought his construction of the Davis amendment was much strained; that if that amendment really related, as I thought, to actual war between the United States and some other power, the absence of the provision in article 11 of the Suez treaty was not so important; that I had no right to speak for the Senate or to say what they meant by the words; that I could refer him to the statement of Senator LODGE, given to the press on December 21, which I knew was authentic, because Senator LODGE had sent a copy of it to Mr. White, and there it was explicitly stated that the real object of the amendment was to negative the promise "to permit a hostile fleet to use the canal." He said he already had that statement, and I told him that he might accept it as the authentic statement of the Senator, who was a foremost member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and knew what the intent of the amendments was. I told him that I thought it would be more just to impute to the Senate, in view of Senator LODGE'S statement as the real purpose of the Davis amendment, to secure to the United States the right of self-defense under all circumstances, notwithstanding the provisions of the first five clauses; that all nations were treated alike in this respect, and that in case of actual war with any power, it being impossible to tell how far they would feel restrained by those provisions from attacking the United States, it was not asking so very much that the United States should reserve the right of defending themselves from attack whenever and wherever; that looking to the practical operation of the matter, given a canal always unfortified, any conflict would naturally resolve itself into a naval one, and Mr. LODGE had in that case fairly disclosed the intent of the amendment. I asked him if he supposed that in such a war the enemy of the United States would permit a United States fleet to pass unmolested through the canal, and how far they would feel restrained by the provisions of the clauses qualified by the Davis amendment, and that if that could not be foreseen, why deprive the United States in any such emergency where it deemed it necessary for its defense of the right to refuse to permit a hostile fleet to use the canal, and was it not fair to impute to the Senate the purpose not further to interfere with the free use of the canal than such necessity required, and why would not all the powers who remained at peace with the United States enjoy the free use of the canal all the while? He said he was afraid of the vague and indefinite nature of the phrase "measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing the defense of the United States"; that it might mean anything that the United States, in its own uncontrolled will, might see fit to have it mean. I commended him to give full consideration to the construction imputed by Senator LODGE to the Davis amendment, and said that of course I had no authority or guide beyond that.

Then, coming to the amendment which erases article 3, providing for inviting other powers to adhere to the convention, he said he found a special difficulty in that, and it was not the one which I had expected as the natural one. He expressed no objection to leaving out the other powers except this, that as by their omission the United States and Great Britain would be the only two contracting powers, the United States would be at liberty, by means of the Davis amendment, to deal with the canal as they pleased; all other powers could attack it, but Great Britain alone, as a contracting power, would have her hands tied by the contract and not be at liberty to do anything, and, dovetailing the two together, he thought the Davis amendment made this amendment highly objectionable. I suggested that this was an ingenious objection, but that here again, if he followed Mr. LODGE in construing the Davis amendment, as applicable to the occasion of actual war, it could have no great weight. Something was said about the practical effect of actual war upon some of the treaty provisions, and in that connection I called his attention to Lord Salisbury's final reason, expressed in the Suez correspondence, page 42, for accepting the tenth clause of the Suez treaty, and asked how far the same doctrine would apply to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as amended. I do not think that this objection to the amendment striking out article 3 was regarded by Lord Lansdowne as of very great weight. I had supposed that he would lay stress upon the great benefit to be derived by all parties concerned, and, in fact, by all the world, from pledging all nations to the neutrality of the canal.

Then reverting to the first amendment, "which convention is hereby superseded," I said supposing some agreement had been come to upon the Davis amendment, securing to the United States the right of self-defense to the extent there provided, what is there left in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which either party should desire to retain? He said, of course the Davis amendment was directly hostile to article 2 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, even as construed by Senator LODGE, and that there would remain of article 1, even if the Davis amendment and the other amendment about other powers were adjusted, the express stipulation that neither party "will occupy or fortify or colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over Central America," etc., to the end of the article. But I asked, wasn't all that provided merely for the purpose of securing the primary object described in the first clause of article 1? He said he believed it was, and then as we went along with the other articles he more than implied that there was nothing of very great importance in them not provided for in the new treaty; but he said, of all his own suggestions, as I said of mine, that they must be taken as wholly unofficial, and were really what occurred to him as the matter came up; but I could discover no strenuous objections in his mind to letting go the rest of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if it were not for the fatal objection to the Davis amendment as it stood. However, this may be the subject of very extended objections before the cabinet and he and Lord Salisbury have got through with it. I told him that I felt deeply desirous that the amendments should be so dealt with as in no manner to disturb the cordial relations and feeling now existing between the two countries; that I thought that an abrupt and blunt refusal to accept them would create some disturbance of feeling and disappointment on our side of the water, and that we should like to feel that they had received the careful consideration to which the high character and motives of their authors were entitled. He said we need not fear any harsh treatment of the matter, although he added that it was a little "abrupt," I think was his word, after they had yielded all that we asked in the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and which had then been accepted as apparently all that was desired, and in doing so they had been declared by our side to have acted with "magnanimity," that these amendments should be sent to them without a word of explanation or statement of reasons why they were desired.

I told him that this arose from the necessary procedure of having the amendments made by the Senate after the treaty had come to their hands in the usual constitutional way; that Senator LODGE'S statement was immediately made to the public as an explanation and statement of reasons, and was entitled as such to careful consideration. He said if it was disappointing to us to have the amendment rejected, it was hard for them, after they had supposed the matter was settled, to have new demands made which again unsettled them; and I said that the new demands were only what the Senate regarded as necessary for the true interest and safety of the United States. I asked him how the amendments would probably be acted upon; that is, would they be submitted to the Cabinet for an immediate vote, or how otherwise. He said he thought that if an immediate vote was taken upon them it would be in the negative; that he thought there was a very general feeling against the amendments; that we were asking too much after they had yielded enough; but the matter would be fully considered, and suggested that perhaps before final action they might give a statement of grounds of objection, with an opportunity for us to answer, if we could. Our interview and discussion of the matter was in a most friendly and courteous spirit, and Lord Lansdowne was good enough to say that he thought it would do good from our point of view of the case; but you know what a courteous man he is. I made no allusion to the pending canal bill or to any prospective change in the composition of the Senate, or to the expiration of Congress on the 4th of March and the new Congress not convening in all probability until December, because I inferred that he knew all these things perfectly well, and have no doubt that he does; and my impression is that the amendments will be considered with that deliberation and caution which is characteristic of all their proceedings, and that we may not receive any answer for some time. He said that possibly he might desire to talk with me again in the same informal, unofficial, and confidential way, to which I replied that I should be happy to respond to any such invitation from him. I told him that I thought he could do nothing to promote the good understanding between the two countries and the peace and welfare of the world so much as by coming to an agreement with us on this treaty as amended. It was his birthday, and it would be a capital way to celebrate it. I can't help thinking that if the way were open for some modification of the Davis amendment by defining it in the direction of Senator LODGE'S statement, so as to meet the criticism, that it might be made to mean anything that the United States should deem necessary for their defense in any way in peace or in war, this very important matter might be satisfactorily settled. In the course of our discussion I asked Lord Lansdowne if he would have been satisfied with the Davis amendment if it included the provision of the eleventh article of the Suez treaty, that measures taken in the cases provided for by articles 9 and 10 "shall not interfere with the free use of the canal," but he was hardly prepared to answer that question. The Cabinet is to meet on Friday, and it may be that before this letter reaches you the matter will be disposed of, but I do not think so.

Yours, very truly,

JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

AUGUST 5, 1901.

DEAR MR. CHOATE: I have received your most interesting letter of the 24th of July and hasten to say I agree entirely with the view contained in it.

(Then follows a reference to the "Peking matter," and then he proceeds about the treaty or the project for the treaty.)

I have read with great interest and entire approval what you have to say about our project of a canal treaty. Your "ideal," as expressed in the third page of your letter, is mine also, but we must work with the tools we have. There are several matters of detail in the project which might be improved if we were working in vacuo, but I thought it desirable to introduce as few changes as possible into the form which had already received the approval of the Senate.

JOHN HAY.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD some remarks by Mr. Neal Henry Ewing pertinent to the subject we are now discussing. They are very instructive, but I shall not occupy the time of the Senate to ask to have them read at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Rewritten from the Review, Roselle Park, N. J.]

THE AMERICAN-BRITISH CONTROVERSY—THE LEGALITY OF OUR FREE TOLLS.

(Neal Henry Ewing, M. A., LL. B.)

This writing aims to add its modicum to the great wave of national expression against the proposal that we retract the exemption of our vessels from the tolls of our Panama Canal; a proposal initiated by a foreign government—under plea of treaty violation—and fostered here at home from a high-minded but mistaken and hence overscrupulous view as to the rectitude of the position which our country has taken.

The question of policy of such exemption will not be entered into except incidentally, the scope of the article being the underlying question of principle which has been the matter of a controversy between the United States and Great Britain. If the British charge of treaty violation could be substantiated, we should certainly bear the humiliation of acknowledgment and reparation, for the sake of justice. But if the British charge proves an unfounded imputation, then, even though diplomatically broached, we should just as certainly repel it, for the sake of our country's standing, and, second, our country's defense.

THE REDUCTION TO ABSURDITY.

1. There are five documents comprising the diplomatic discussion of the Panama tolls exemption—the note of Mr. Mitchell Innes of July 8, 1912; the memorandum of President Taft of August 24, 1912; the note of Sir Edward Grey of November 14, 1912 (delivered December 9, 1912); the reply of Secretary of State Knox of January 17, 1913; and the note of Ambassador Bryce of February 27, 1913.

Ambassador Bryce merely urges arbitration. He states: "His Majesty's Government have not desired me to argue in this note that the view they take of the main issue—the proper interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty—is the correct view."

Thus the British Government professedly refrains from pursuing the argument, and after the lapse of a year the American contention still holds the field.

2. Great Britain has put forward two distinct arguments, the first based on the all-nations provision, and the second and later one based on the provision for just charges.

3. President Taft, in his memorandum of approval, answers the all-nations argument by a reduction to the absurd:

"If it is correct, then, to assume that there is nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty preventing Great Britain and the other nations from extending such favors as they may see fit to their shipping using the canal, and doing it in the way they see fit, and if it is also right to assume that there is nothing in the treaty that gives the United States any supervision over or right to complain of such action, then the British protest leads to the absurd conclusion that this Government in constructing the canal, maintaining the canal, and defending the canal finds itself shorn of its right to deal with its own commerce in its own way, while all other nations using the canal in competition with American commerce enjoy that right and power unimpaired."

4. The British Government tacitly admits the absurdity of the contemplated state of affairs, but denies its conclusive character. This it would avoid by giving its objection a restricted scope. While impugning the virtual subsidy of the canal act, it "does not question the right of the United States to grant subsidies to United States shipping generally."

Now, on the one hand the admission is suicidal, and on the other hand the restriction still leaves the protest to the harassing absurdity.

5. The consequence of admitting a general subsidy. Under a system of nonexemption such as is urged, a general American subsidy, however low, would operate as a partial relief of tolls. Now, since the right to subsidize is not conditioned on the maintenance of subsidies by all other nations or by any other nation, but is independent in its root, it follows that the British Goverment must admit a partial relieving of tolls by subsidies as permissible; and as a consequence a total relieving also, for the two cases of relieving differ in degree but not in kind. In point of fact the general subsidy (conceded as proper) need only be made high enough to offset tolls completely, and to demand a maximum limit for subsidies would be quite as clearly an infraction of sovereignty as would be their absolute impeachment.

6. Now, since total exemption of tolls (actually established by the present law) and such totally relieving subsidy (as supposedly established after the proposed Sims repeal) have the same purpose and the same effect, any distinction between the two courses of action is unsubstantial and illusory.

It follows, then, from the British admission of the propriety of a general subsidy that free tolls for American vessels are permissible under the treaty. Thus Great Britain's admission, by which it ought to escape from an absurd conclusion, cuts away all ground for its protest.

7. Furthermore, the protest for all its restriction of scope is hampered with the absurdity of conclusion. Both Governments agree that "there is no difference in principle between charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether." For parity of reason there is no difference in principle between remitting tolls and advancing the money with which the tolls may be paid, and from the British view this last course of action would likewise fall under the adverse judgment.

8. Advancing tolls money. Let us suppose under a system of nonexemption two vessels, American and British, arriving at Colon. Let each home Government, through a financial representative, advance to its vessel the exact sum of tolls money that it is called upon to pay.

This would afford equality. For first there would be equality of tolls and second there would be equality in relief. Here, then, is a touchstone, and whichever contention will stand its test is the more reasonable.

On the one hand we find that the allowing of exemption under the present law conforms to this plan of equality; there is, in fact, as above noted, no difference in principle between the two. On the other hand, the forbidding of exemption fails to adjust with this equitable plan. For if the British contention is sound, the United States could be thus enjoined: "You (alone of all nations) are forbidden to relieve your vessels."

And if Great Britain omitted to relieve its shipping it could not charge the United States with the omission. Besides, there would still be equality in potential relief; that is to say, in relievability, just as under the present law there is this equality in potential relief which the United States for its part at once changes from potential to actual, leaving Great Britain and other foreign nations to enjoy the like freedom of action.

There can not be at the same time rigid equality in the relation of canal and vessels—allowing no option of exemption—and also equality in the relation of vessels and home governments; the reason, of course, being the twofold character which the United States sustains. The United States by becoming canal owner did not forfeit its character of home government of American vessels using the canal. These are not ships without a country. Therefore the proposition that the United States must hold itself to equality with other nations in the matter of tolls collection—reducing itself to the level of its own most-favored nations—can only be maintained after the natural equality of the United States with other nations in the matter of dealing with its own commerce has been destroyed. The superficial equalizing finds itself opposed by an equality more substantial and fundamental.

9. Nor could the United States, on the ground that Great Britain's action in advancing tolls produced an inequality, raise the rates for the British vessels with a view to restoring equal conditions. The treaty gives the United States no such inquisitorial rights, and Great Britain would, with reason, deny that such advancing of tolls constituted any inequality within the meaning of the treaty.

Yet if the United States, as the home government for American vessels, were in its turn to advance tolls to its nationals, Great Britain would charge a violation of equality.

No rule of consistency appears here except, indeed, the extraneous one of striving for the same objective—a consistency devoid of legal value. The inconsistency is patent and vitiates its argument.

10. We may observe in passing, in view of its citation in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that "the convention respecting the navigation of the Suez maritime canal" leaves all nations to their right of relieving their vessels by subsidies. Great Britain exercises this right and would not deny it there to the United States.

11. The exorbitance of the protest shows in more pronounced light when we consider that the British view would forbid the United States to meet in kind a general movement operating to its detriment, even though concerted. It is not merely that the United States could not inaugurate the practice of advancing tolls—which the Panama Canal act does in effect—but it could not adopt the practice even in the wake of all the nations of the world.

Indeed, the United States would have to remain quiescent even if the world powers, in furtherance of their South American trade and in competition with the United States, should grant canal bonuses over and above the tolls money.

12. Nor is it an answer to say that Great Britain might not press its advantage in the premises and hold the United States to the extremity of these hard terms, for it is not more absurd that the United States should see its right to subsidize actually curtailed than that it should exercise this right on foreign sufferance and forbearance.

And even with a pledge from the British Government—which is lacking—that they would forego this advantage, the British contention would not be helped, for they have not so pledged themselves in the treaty; and it is the treaty obligations and rights that are under discussion.

Hence even if Great Britain limits its protest to the form of subsidy contained in the canal act, its disclaimer will not avail, and the weight of President Taft's charge of absurd conclusion falls on the protest with its full argumentative force.

From the foregoing it results, first, that the British claim entails absurd consequences even without regard to the sovereignty of the United States over the canal, and this in view of the sovereignty of the United States over its commerce and of its ownership of the canal; and, second, that the same absurdity attaches to any challenging of free tolls for our over-sea vessels as attaches to such challenging for our coastwise marine.

THE BURDEN OF PROOF.

13. As will be remarked, the conclusion to which the British protest leads is absurd, not logically but practically, and hence in the end it is a matter of possible treaty stipulation. Nevertheless the absurdity of conclusion must not be forgotten in our examination of the treaty, as is the case with the proponents of repeal generally; the absurd character of the conclusion is closely relevant, and this for the reason that it brings with it a heavy burden of proof. International law is not tender, but severe toward those who would use a treaty to wrest from a nation a sovereign right. If two constructions are possible, if two points of view may be taken, that one is to be rejected which derogates from governmental liberty.

If the British plan of attack is involved in any doubt, it is discredited, native possession holding a just vantage ground. Therefore, even if the British claim were from the face of the treaty the stronger claim—instead of being, as it proves to be, by far the weaker—it would sink beneath its burden of extravagant conclusion, unless, passing beyond such merely stronger demonstration, it could find in the face of the treaty entire and undebatable support.

In the words, then, of the Hon. William M. Collier: "The United States may grant a subsidy in any form as it chooses unless its treaty obligations by express terms or by absolutely necessary inference have restricted it."

14. If, as was suggested by President Taft immediately after the passage of the bill, the Panama Canal act were amended so as to permit subjects of foreign nations to try the question at issue in the Supreme Court of the United States, that tribunal would have for its precedent its own ruling in the case of Ogden v. Saunders (12 Wheat., 269):

"It is but a decent respect for the wisdom, integrity, and patriotism of the legislative body by which any law is passed to presume in favor of its validity until its violation of the Constitution is proved beyond a reasonable doubt."

Now, a violation of the treaty in the present case would be coincident with a violation of the Constitution. Thus the fact itself of the present tolls exemption militates hypothetically against the British contention for American minds. Nor could Great Britain flout this view as purely subjective, for it does not comport with international comity that one nation should in a controversy treat as negligible either the wisdom of the opposed nation or its integrity or its patriotic regard for national consistency and honor, as evidenced in its legislation.

While, then, the fact of exemption does not directly touch the merits of exemption, it is nevertheless relevant. An added doubt exists for the benefit of the American contention; an added weight falls on Great Britain's burden of proof.

15. Nor is it superfluous to observe that from the treaty correspondence and public discussions 12 and 13 years ago the British Government fails now to produce any allusion to the restriction of our right of maritime subvention which its contention involves. This argues that no such allusion is to be found, for if available it would be cited. We are expected, then, to believe that American officials would deem no word of explanation necessary when fastening on their country a great and permanent disability.

16. Let us search the treaty for the "express terms" of subsidy restriction, or, failing this, for the requisite "absolutely necessary inference" of such restriction.

The treaty does not yield one express word impairing the right of the United States to aid its commerce by subvention. If such impairment was, in fact, considered, it is a matter for surprise and explanation that a consequence so momentous should not be thought worthy by the high contracting parties of comment or adversion, but should be left in implication.

It can not be rejoined that neither, on the other hand, does the treaty expressly permit the United States to subsidize its canal vessels, for such right does not have to seek its warrant in the treaty; it rests on the original sovereignty of the United States over its commerce and was subsisting undisturbed under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty when the present agreement was concluded.

In point of fact, if, as falls within the contemplation of the present treaty (art. 2), the canal had been "constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States," not "directly at its own cost," but "by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares," the plea that the treaty had restricted the United States in its right to subsidize under such circumstances would be too patently wrong to be urged. Yet nowhere does the treaty make a distinction as to the consequences, in this regard, of the different plans of constructions.

17. As to the "absolutely necessary inference" of subsidy restriction in the treaty, no independent lodgment for it has been suggested apart from its disputed premise, the point of controversy, that tolls exemption is prohibited. Since, then, the extravagant conclusion of impaired sovereignty is not independently bolstered in the treaty by its own proper implication, its disputed premise is all the more to be suspected.

With an enormous handicap, therefore, placed on it by the logic and law of the case, the British contention against the right of exemption stands to be tested. Here, naturally, we are left again to implication. There is no provision by express words that free tolls for American vessels are permissible only on the prodigious terms that the United States shall forego all compensation for its vast expenditures.

THE ALL-NATIONS PROVISION.

18. As noticed above, two clauses of the treaty are appealed to in the protest, the all-nations clause and the just-charges clause.

Here follows the text of that part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty (concluded November 18, 1901), the construction of which is the matter of dispute:

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable."

19. The summary of argument currently advanced to show discrepancy between the canal act and the treaty is that since the United States is a nation it is necessarily included in the phrase "all nations."

But the expression "any such nation" in the very same sentence bids us look for some qualifying antecedent, which, indeed, we find. The unbroken phrase reads: "All nations observing these rules." Furthermore, the preceding section yields the pertinent fact that "the United States adopts" the rules under notice.

It is, then, a truncating of the question to ask whether the United States, being a nation, is not included in "all nations." This offers a glimpse at the treaty and not a full view. Let it be inquired rather whether the United States, having adopted rules, is or is not included in "all nations observing these rules."

There is no reason for not considering these two functions, adopting and observing, to be as distinct as are the words which describe them. To adopt rules which others must, even though contingently, observe is to lay down rules for such others; as far as any transaction eventuates, the two parties are the rule giver and the rule obeyers.

The United States alone adopts the rules, and is thus distinguished from all other nations, even from the cosignatory, Great Britain.

While Great Britain agrees with the United States as to what rules are to be adopted, it withdraws and allows the rules to be adopted by the United States.

Thus the very fact that Great Britain is a party to the treaty throws into relief the unique position with regard to the rules which is occupied by the United States.

20. Again, the treaty guarantees that such nations as qualify therefor shall have free and open passage for their vessels, and it is these same nations that are covered by equality of terms, since there is no intimation of a distinction, nor, indeed, by the grammatical construction, any room for it. "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality."

But since the United States controls the canal it is not necessary that it should guarantee freedom of passage for its vessels of commerce and of war. Furthermore, this would be pointless, as Great Britain could not have concern that the United States should deal fairly with American vessels. Since, then, it can not be seriously maintained that Great Britain secured the promulgation of any such guaranty as curator of maritime nationals of the United States, to safeguard their interests against their own country, it follows that the United States is not a subject for treaty guaranty in the matter of canal passage. Hence, as a further consequence, the United States is not a subject of treaty regard in the matter of equal terms which are extended to all nations observing the rules.

21. Again, the treaty provides in regard to a certain class (the rule-observing nations) that there shall be "terms of entire equality" for all, "so that there shall be no discrimination against any." Now, the natural interpretation of this is that every one of the rule-observing nations shall be free from discrimination. The expression "so that" is grammatically an equation of purpose or intention and it refers "any" to everyone of the "all." In other words, the treaty contemplates the guaranty against discrimination as fully coextensive with observance of the rules. If, then, we find that the United States is not a possible subject for discrimination, it is not included in the mind of the treaty within the rule-observing nations.

Now, since discrimination can only come from the United States—because with it rest "the regulation and management of the canal"—and since discrimination by the United States against the United States or its nationals is not a matter for British solicitude, or treaty stipulation, it follows that the treaty does not contemplate the United States as a subject for discrimination. As a further consequence, therefore, the treaty does not contemplate the United States as being included in "all nations observing these rules."

22. The treaty couples "vessels of commerce and of war." They are put on the same footing; no distinction as to tolls is made. Furthermore, in regard to foreign vessels, it is not contended by Great Britain that there is to be any distinction between them. If we would know, then, whether exemption is admissible for American vessels of commerce—the point of dispute—it is highly pertinent to inquire concerning American vessels of war. Now, exemption for American men-of-war must be, and in fact is, admitted, for any tolls levied upon American men-of-war would be supported by the owner of the canal, the United States Government. To deny, then, that the owner of the canal may relieve American merchantmen is to introduce into the case an element of confusion.

Since, in other words, under the treaty there was admittedly no intention of including one class of American vessels under equality of terms, it is more closely consistent, in the lack of distinguishing words, to deduce a lack of such intention for the other class, rather than to suppose its existence.

23. The rules of the treaty were adopted "as the basis of the neutralization" of the canal. The British Government would let "neutralization" imply "equal rights" having in view equal rates, and would actually restrict the present instance of the word to this bearing. This definition offends precedent, general and particular; for it runs counter to the accepted meaning of the word and it does not conform to the significance given to it by the same Governments when treating of the same matter.

The present treaty supersedes the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of April 19, 1850, except that the construction of a canal "under the auspices of the Government of the United States," as authorized, is to be had "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8" of the earlier convention. Let us consult the source of the general principle. The main body of the earlier treaty guarantees the "neutrality and security" of a Nicaraguan canal and this neutrality can not consist of or imply equal rights, for the settlement thereof lay without the treaty jurisdiction, however much a matter of treaty concern.

Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty provides that "the Governments of the United States and Great Britain having * * * desired * * * to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection * * * to any other practicable communications * * *. In granting, however, their joint protection * * * it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or operating the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

Here, then, the force of the word "general" is to extend neutrality otherwise referable to a particular canal only, so as to cover communications by all routes and by canals or railways. Neutralization has its field enlarged; and there is thus no necessity and hence no warrant for disturbing its accepted significance.

By the eighth article the signatories do not guarantee equal rights or rates and furthermore they are not in a position to do so. The understanding that the rates are to be equal is not an agreement to this effect, but simply a supposition, which, if actualized, would support neutralization. On the other hand, there is a guaranty of neutrality, although conditional. Equal rates and neutrality are not put on the same ground, but are distinguished, coming from different and, in fact, opposite sources.

Thus we see the error of the second British note in mentioning the principle of article 8, "which provides," it states, "for the equal treatment of British and United States ships."

We further read in this second note that in article 8 "there is no mention of belligerent action at all. Joint protection and equal treatment are the only matters alluded to and it is to one or both of them that neutralization must refer." It is more reasonable to say that whatever joint protection implies falls within the purview. We can not then ignore belligerency when protection is alluded to for the total content and the whole concern of protection is a refraining from belligerency and a restraining of the belligerency of others.

The British note intimates that the United States was "most anxious to get rid" of joint protection and therefore that it was not joint protection to which the United States referred in the preamble of the present treaty; continuing that, on the other side: "It certainly was not the intention of His Majesty's Government that any responsibility for the protection of the canal should attach to them in the future. Neutralization must therefore refer to the system of equal rights."

Protection as joint was certainly meant to cease. But what good reason is there to dwell on the circumstance of jointness and disregard the operation to which it belongs? Protection, whether joint or otherwise, is a restraint of others and self from belligerency to its object. Under the present system protection, though no longer joint, continues, devolving upon the United States under the first law of nature.

Protection is a burden, a "responsibility." That it should cease to be joint, that Great Britain should be relieved of responsibility, is a contract consideration extended by the United States, of which, indeed, Great Britain shows a clear appreciation in its present disavowal.

Other nations, furthermore, though they need not protect the canal, must respect its immunity from attack. This is the condition for their enjoyment of the canal privileges. In this way the general principle of neutralization is preserved.

In the same note Sir Edward Grey observes that if the present treaty secures "to Great Britain no more than most-favored-nation treatment, the value of the consideration given for superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not apparent to His Majesty's Government."

Great Britain, as will be noticed, nowhere assumes to occupy a position in regard to tolls better than that of other foreign nations. If, then, Great Britain wonders why it should be considered no more than a conditional most-favored nation in the matter of canal treatment, there is cause for it to wonder how it came to be on a level with other foreign nations in this regard. There is the same explanation for both cases.

For, as has been pointed out by the Hon. Lewis Nixon, "the entire Clayton-Bulwer convention speaks of equal treatment, owing to the fact that equal obligations were undertaken in affording protection and in guaranteeing neutrality."

The consideration, therefore, which eludes Great Britain's cognizance is a relief from "responsibility" of protection; and its value is sufficiently evidenced in Great Britain's present emphasis on its withdrawal from the support of such burden. It is on account of this withdrawal that Great Britain takes its place in the general level of outside nations.

The following provisions appear in the treaty: "The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any act of war * * * be exercised within it. * * * Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual * * * in the canal. * * * Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters. * * * The plant establishments, buildings, * * * shall enjoy complete immunity from attack." Before the conclusion, therefore, can be reached that the neutralization for which the rules are a basis must refer to equal rights only and not to belligerency, the above provisions must disappear from the treaty.

It is evident, then, that the general principle of neutralization of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was to remain unimpaired under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, not by equal rights and rates, something which the first treaty never guaranteed but only aspired after; something which as unestablished was not a subject for impairment; but by canal immunity (neutralization properly so called) which that treaty did in set terms offer.

24. As seen above, the imposing of the treaty rules is to be viewed as not extending to the United States because of its position as rule giver. If besides this the character of the rules is such as to render them inapplicable to the United States, then plainly the United States was not intended to be included in "all nations observing these rules." The rules are six in number. Concerning the last five, the American contention sets forth: "Then follow five rules to be observed by other nations to make neutralization effective, the observance of which is the condition for the privilege of using the canal."

A reading of the rules shows, indeed, their plain incongruity to the position of canal owner and canal sovereign.

The British Government did not controvert the statement that rules 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 were laid down for the observance of other nations than the United States. It contented itself by explaining as to rules 3, 4, and 5 that while at the date of the signature of the treaty the canal territory did not belong to the United States, "now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection."

The British Government, however, can not evade a consequence of argument by a concession intended to dispense with the argument itself. It can not account for a status under the treaty by a present validation thereof. The title must exist by reason of the treaty or not at all. Therefore Great Britain's statement that now it does not "question" the right under consideration must stand as an admission that under the present circumstances the treaty allows the right, not that an admission naturally is required.

But if, under whatever circumstances, the treaty allows the right, it must be for the reason of original exclusion of the United States from the rule-observing nations and not for the reason of change in territorial sovereignty—unless it is Great Britain's meaning to disregard the fourth article of the same Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or of the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

Nor could the British Government help its contention by setting up likewise against article 4 the rule of rebus sic stantibus, that the treaty was made on the supposition of "conditions thus standing," and that the passing of the territorial sovereignty, not to some other third nation, but to the United States itself, was an essential change in conditions such as was not really contemplated by article 4, because this plea would have invited disaster.

For the principle, if once introduced, can not be restrained for the required purpose of discussion; and if its standpoint is accepted, then, as is shown by the distinguished publicist, the Hon. Hannis Taylor, even if we admit for argument that the United States was originally looked upon as one of the rule-observing nations, "we have now a perfect right, under the rule of rebus sic stantibus, to demand a modification, as the treaty as a whole has become voidable or 'notifiable.'"

Thus, if the British Government essays to cross the barrier of the fourth article, it finds itself without a place to stand, while if it remains within the barrier, it must face the controlling fact of the inapplicability of the rules to the United States.

Senator ROOT remarks in his oration of May 21: "There is not a rule from the second to the fifth that does not impose duties upon the United States"; and then comes to particulars, as, for instance: "If ships of war in time of war loiter in the canal, it will be the duty of the United States to urge them forward." Assuming this to be correct, how does it help the British claim? Other nations must observe these rules and the United States must see that they do so. But how can this be tortured into the sense that the United States must observe the rule itself (as though observance and enforcement were the same thing)? And, failing this, the remark of the distinguished speaker does not meet the matter of issue.

25. The British claim of American inclusion is hindered therefore by several aspects of the treaty centering about the following phrases: "Observing these rules," "free and open," "discrimination," "and of war," "neutralization," and also by the very character of the rules themselves.

Not only, then, does the impairment of the right to subsidize (the absurd conclusion of the British claim) decidedly lack any "absolutely necessary inference" on the score of inclusion of the United States in "all nations observing these rules," but the inference on this head leads us in the opposite direction.

THE JUST-CHARGES PROVISION.

26. To reenforce its position the British Government, in its second note, surmises that the system of American exemption would "impose upon British or other foreign commerce an unfair share in the burden of the upkeep of the canal."

The treaty provides that "the charges shall be just and equitable." Now, there are two factors determining the justness of the charges. First, the aggregate tolls must not exceed a just maximum, the regard being had to interest on capital, to cost of operation and maintenance, and to amortization. Secondly, this aggregate must be evenly distributed so that no vessel shall bear more than its proper quota.

The first element is entirely untouched by the difference between the two systems. The second element accommodates itself as well to one system as to the other. Under exemption there merely stands the added caution that any vessels properly exempted shall be continued in the calculation as part of the volume of commerce, since such they do not cease to be. In this way the exempted tolls are not thrown upon foreign commerce, but are borne vicariously by the Government of the United States, which has voluntarily adopted this plan.

It is not relevant to say that exemption is unjust if by reason thereof the tolls are made unduly high (having in mind a voluntary effect). The unjust feature of such conjectured transaction would not be found in exemption, but directly in the excessive tolls. In order to attach it to exemption it must first be shown that by reason thereof the tolls must be made unduly high.

But under either system (exemption or nonexemption) there is the same opportunity for propriety in the matter of charges, and there is the same opportunity for impropriety, and whatever avenues of protection or redress are open to foreign Governments under one system remain open to them under the other. It is unfounded, therefore, in the absence of any necessary casual relation between free tolls for American vessels and excessive tolls for foreign vessels, that the first should be challenged on the ground of the unlawfulness of the second.

27. The British Government intimates, indeed, that with exemption it is not feasible to take into account the exempted tolls in the calculation of the rates. It does not show, however, wherein the difficulty consists. In the case of each successive change in the tolls to meet changing circumstances the computation of the tolls need not lack the necessary data. For it could hardly be supposed that the canal records would in any event be so scanty as not to show the total volume of commerce (which would include "vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States"); and at all events, given an occasion for recording the volume of commerce, it is doubly unfounded to suppose that it would not be done.

And if it is to be assumed (by pure gratuity) that the United States will fail to keep the necessary records, the effect of such imagined remissness would bear as heavily against one system as against the other and would be an argument, not for repeal of free tolls, but for taking away from the United States the management of the canal after its successful construction.

For the computation of the initial tolls there is, of course, no record to serve as a basis, but recourse must be had to an estimate. Prof. Emory R. Johnson, special commissioner of Panama traffic and tolls, has set the total at ten and a half million tons for the year 1915, including American coast-to-coast shipping, and on this was based the present tolls. Since the estimate of the total commerce is independent of the system of exemption, whatever imperfection the estimate may have (it is in point of fact highly considered), it is not due to our system of free tolls.

28. That the United States, by way of reimbursement for remitted tolls, should ever levy excessive tolls on nonexempted vessels (something which the present tariff avoids with the widest margin of caution) would indeed be unjust. But in order to deduce from this the injustice of exemption it would be necessary to frame a new principle of law, namely, that "any act is itself wrong the consequence of which may later be alleged as a pretext for some other act admittedly and independently wrong." The unsoundness of such a rule would match its novelty. As Secretary Knox cogently remarks: "It is the improper exercise of a power and not its possession which alone can give rise to an international cause of action." And not only so, but even with the system of nonexemption there is no way of limiting the power and thus saving Great Britain harmless, short of Great Britain's assumption of the canal management.

Hence Great Britain's second plea, the just-charges provision, falls wide of the mark and takes its place with the objection first advanced.

RELATED OBSERVATIONS.

29. The liberty of the United States in the premises thus standing beyond the reach of the attack it is quite proper to dwell on the incentives to the exercise of that liberty.

Thus Senator O'GORMAN, the protagonist of the current debate, makes the telling observation that the Democratic free-tolls plank of 1912 "was the one dominant American note in that campaign." The Progressive platform, of later date, gave it a hearty response, while the Republican candidate, in a practical way, committed his party, without protest, to the free-tolls principle when, by his ready approval, the Panama Canal bill became American law.

There was, in fact, no occasion to make free tolls an issue of campaign debate, the parties being in such accord thereon and the dissentients in any party not jeopardizing their party's chances by inopportuneness.

30. As exemplified by James G. Blaine, in his review of the fisheries dispute, the British Government is remarkable, alert, adroit, and eager to gain points of diplomatic interest, so strong is its maternal solicitude for the British.

It is for Great Britain a natural disappointment that the United States (seemingly in disregard of its tradition) should now enact a maritime subvention competitive with British and Canadian interests and of marked initiative.

This is the gravamen of Great Britain's real grievance, and it does not admit of legal formulation. It is a case of "loss without injury," unless we concede that the right of the United States to help its commerce has lapsed through nonuser, and that Great Britain may exploit the American tradition and has acquired vested rights thereunder.

Concurring in the estimate of Prof. Emory R. Johnson, opinion is settled that only after a number of years will the canal be self-sustaining, whether or not with tolls for all. This results, at least in part, in the United States dispensing for years to come a largess to the maritime nations.

Great Britain from its colossal commerce (nurtured on subsidies) is the chief beneficiary of this general bounty. It would thus retain the consolation of "the greatest service ever rendered to one nation by another in the entire commercial history of the world" (to quote the judgment of Senator BRISTOW) in the rejection of its claim that the United States may not afford the supplementary free-tolls aid to its own commerce.

Nor should Americans be asked to feel agitation over the diminution in canal receipts resulting from American exemption and benefit, while at the same time they are left to view with equanimity the above general item of reduction, several times greater, which will inure far more to foreign nations than to our own.

31. If we seek an explanation of the reversal in the Panama Canal act of the traditional American attitude toward subsidies, we find that this reversal is apparent rather than real. Our quasi subsidy owes its exceptive popularity to its exceptional character, because in its case there is accentuated the view that certain American nationals are preferred to foreign nationals, because it tends to curb the monopoly of the transcontinental railroads, and because the quasi subsidy is not payment of money, subject to varied diversion, but is service only.

There is a final reason that would seem to have special weight, and in fact to change the aspect of the case, namely, that the subsidy attaches not to the ocean voyage, but directly to the passage through American territory, thus approximating closely to our system of domestic improved waterways and canals, so that in their regard there would be "a reversal of the time-honored policy of the United States" in anything short of toll-free passage through American territory for American ships plying between American seaboard and American seaboard.

32. There is to be added that this plan of subsidy, having been actually established by American law, is subjected by a foreign Government to an attack which would involve the matter of policy into one of principle. This serves as a constraint against receding, lest suspension of the exercise of our rights (and this at the instance of our great commercial competitor) should compromise the rights themselves.

Nor is the Sims repeal bill particularly improved in this respect by the Simmons amendment, which, noncommittal as to the issue, would safeguard "any treaty or other right possessed by the United States" instead of intrenching in direct and open words "the right of the United States to exempt from canal tolls all its vessels of whatever kind."

It is of incidental interest that American pleasure craft and ships designed to secure and keep American laurels in the great marine olympic seem to lie outside the plane of treaty contention.

33. If, as is well urged, the Panama Canal is to be a benediction to humanity, this implies that the world benefits are not limited to the shippers of the world, and hence that the shippers of any nation under notice do not monopolize from these benefits that nation's portion. If, then, the American share in the general benefits of the canal are not restricted to American commerce, then, by the same principle of solidarity, the special benefits (derived from tolls exemption) are an asset of the American people at large. Thus the wide outlook of the Panama enterprise, which universally strikes the imagination, serves to enhance the popular aspect of our tolls exemption.

It is claimed, however, that the exemption gives money to the shipowners without any benefit to shippers. This offers a dilemma. For if the shipowners do not use the money to increase their business (which is directed to one or the other of the American coasts), then competing British or Canadian commerce (directed to the same points) is not affected; in which case Great Britain's protest must be explained as academic. But this view is untenable, for Great Britain, as is well understood, has a real and practical interest in repeal.

If, then, the subsidy is used to work an increase of our coastwise commerce and an extension of our commercial flag (a patriotic desideratum); in other words, if American coast-to-coast trade will be greater without tolls than with tolls, this stimulation is necessarily brought about by lower rates for coast-to-coast shippers, for there is no other variation of business conditions to bear upon the case.

34. It has been prominently suggested that the United States should recede from its position in the matter of tolls "from a decent respect to the opinions of mankind." The allusion is infelicitous, as this historic phrase had its rise in a difficulty between the selfsame countries, when the decent respect was had, not by any reversal of action, but by making known the causes of our stand.

Curiously, as may be noted, Great Britain at that time persisted in a plan of taxing us, which taxing we resisted, while now Great Britain insists that we must levy certain taxes on ourselves.

In the present juncture the United States, by a close parallel to its former action, has not sent to Great Britain a note of relinquishment, nor, on the other hand, proceeded without a civil reply, but has diplomatically vindicated its course in two masterly declarations.

GENERAL CONCLUSION.

35. The following, therefore, is a fair epitome of the American-British controversy: First, that the American Government would suffer a functional impairment, both wide and fixed, through the operation of the British claim, which claim consequently international law will tolerate only if established on absolute and undebatable ground. Second, that the British Government has signally omitted to establish its claim with this unquestionable certainty, which, in view of its abnormal consequence, international law exacts; and that, far short of this, it does not afford its claim an equal or even a moderate probability, and leaves it encumbered and beset with a number of embarrassments. Third, that the controversy, which was inaugurated by Great Britain, fails for Great Britain's purpose and leaves intact the right of the United States to exempt from tolls its own vessels, as an incident of its sovereignty.

36. A regard for our treaty does not imply a regard for its forced and extreme interpretation, requiring us to forego our treaty rights. Since, therefore, the violation of the treaty is an imagination, as demonstrated by our Government, and since the British charge of violation is a reality, there is no reason why Americans should feel anxiety on the score of the one; but rather there is reason why they should refuse admission to the other, and for their country's honor cast it back.

MR. BUNAU-VARILLA AND THE PANAMA CANAL LAW.

A REPLY TO THE ARGUMENTS OF THE FRENCH ENGINEER AND DIPLOMAT.

[From the New York Sun of Sept. 30, 1912.]

A novel attack on the Panama Canal law is set forth in the Shipping World by the eminent engineer and diplomat, Mr. Bunau-Varilla. His argument is based on the stipulation in article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty: "The charges shall be just and equitable." This he construes to mean: "The charges shall be such as to cover the expenses of operation and interest on and reimbursement of the capital invested."

He should rather put it that the charges shall not more than cover the items specified. It could not be held that the United States violated the treaty through allowing the total receipts to fall below any particular point, even though the canal were made toll free, since the tolls themselves go to meet items to the credit of the United States. Surely the United States is not under treaty restriction in the matter of foregoing its own dues. The critic's looseness of expression is really looseness of idea; it serves as a link in his argument; for he maintains that if a large part of the trade is allowed to pass the canal free, the tolls collected will be largely diminished and universal trade will be unduly taxed, owing to the suppression of part of the canal's earning power.

Since if a large deduction is made from any amount that amount will show a large reduction, his statement as to the diminution of tolls is necessarily correct. In contrast with this his further statement as to undue taxation of universal trade is in the nature of a prophecy; it has logical value only if we adopt the incorrect premise that by "just and equitable charges" there is implied a minimum in the proceeds which must be kept up to at all hazards.

Besides, to come particularly to the point, whatever might be the apprehension that the United States, by way of compensating for the loss of tolls, would advance the rates or fail to reduce them with the increase of commerce, the proper contention would be not against the exempting of American ships but against the exemption being used as a pretext for holding the rates too high, if this should ever come to pass.

Let the policy of canal tolls be what it may, there is always room for the possibility of the rates being too high. Exemption leaves room for this and nonexemption does not shut it out. It is plainly wrong, therefore, to intimate that there is a causal relation between exemption and excessive rates. And thus undue taxation of general trade not following necessarily from loss of American tolls, the critic's argument, which assumes the necessity of the consequence, must fall with its support. If the principle were correct, instead of being incorrect, that the income not only may but must equal the proper items of credit—whatever the exact determination of these may be—then exemption would, indeed, involve higher rates. But this unsound notion naturally invalidates any conclusion attached to it.

This wrong idea appears again in the critic's remark: "The United States is a trustee of humanity in this great work. The law just quoted puts her in the unenviable position of a trustee who uses part of the proceeds of the trusteeship in favor of his own family."

The fallacy of the ambiguous middle term lurks here. The obligation of the United States, besides building, maintaining, and defending the canal, is to draw no more income from the enterprise than is just, with reference to the outlay, and to let no more of the burden of tolls fall on any ship than is its share with reference to the total commerce. This takes effect to the benefit of the world at large; but for all that the United States remains a contractor under the treaty and not a trustee.

To be sure, there need be no objection to the use of the word "trustee" in a broad, general way if this use is consistently adhered to. But there is need of instant objection to any shuffling between this and the exact meaning of the word—"a person to whom property or funds have been committed in the belief and trust that he will hold and apply the same for the benefit of those who are entitled."

If now the "proceeds of the trusteeship" are to be applied to expenses, interest, and reimbursement, as we are told, they are to be laid to the account of the trustee itself. How misleading is the insinuation that the United States must account for the disposition of the proceeds to some beneficiary.

If this beneficiary could only be conjured up, then, of course, exemption to American shipping would be to his loss and injury, and no compensation for the loss could rightfully be secured by increasing the rates, since this would in its turn be an unwarranted levying on foreign commerce. But as this state of affairs can not obtain, it is idle to base an argument upon it. Thus we see the unfounded character of the critic's disparagement of our country in his attempted comparison.

Mr. Bunau-Varilla restates his argument in a recent article in the New York Sun, which, aside from rhetorical topics—complimentary and exhortative—is largely taken up in showing that the United States is a "trustee for humanity" in the canal enterprise. Here again he leaves the nature of the "trust" under a wrong insinuation, as though the proceeds—provided they do not result from excessive rates—do not belong to the United States Government, which is under no trust for their disposition.

The critic contends that the United States implicitly declared "that she would reimburse herself on the proceeds, but that she would not deviate a part of them to her own advantage." The proceeds, however, unless they should come with the taint of excessive rates, all belong to their collector. It is not reimbursement on the proceeds, but with the proceeds, and there is thus no part left for any kind of diverting.

Separating, now, the matters of rates and exemption, which the distinguished French critic would entangle, let us consider the rates as unduly low, normal, and unduly high. As observed above, the rates can not be unduly low; even if the United States made the canal toll free, no foreign country could gainsay this course. As far as the rates are normal, the proceeds belong in the General Treasury of the United States with its other revenues. And there then remains, fixed on its own independent foundation, the right of the United States to grant subsidies.

If, from increase of commerce or from whatever cause, the proceeds should tend to become excessive, such changing conditions must be met, and the proper corrective is clearly a lowering of the rates. And just as the occasion for the corrective is a possibility under the system of nonexemption as well as under the system of exemption, so the application of the corrective is as feasible under the second system as under the first.

Lastly, in the ascertaining of the rates the same calculation should be followed under either treatment of American vessels. Let the dividend cover the proper items of credit, and whatever difference of opinion there may be as to what these are, the matter lies apart from the question of exemption. Let the divisor include the American commerce. The resulting quotient is the rate of charges, and these are then "just and equitable." They may, of course, be lowered indefinitely at the option of the United States itself. The quota being thus fairly laid on all ships passing the canal, each country, the United States not excluded, is left free to take the burden from its commerce to its own shoulders by subsidies or, in the case of the United States, by equivalent remission of tolls.

Under the present law, therefore, the United States, in the successive readjustments of rates, must base the rates on the American ships being included in the total commerce. But it is one thing to recognize that the United States could not rightfully reimburse itself from foreign shipping for the dues remitted to American ships; and it is something quite different to contend that the United States could not relieve its ships in the first instance, the allegation being that this might serve as a pretext for such reimbursement. The only foundation for this contention would be a rule of law that any act the consequence of which might later be advanced by the person acting as a pretext or incorrect reason for some wrongdoing is itself wrong, and the absurdity of such a rule need not be pressed.

Incidentally, the incongruity of forcing the United States to charge American warships for the use of the canal would be easily seen; and the same would be true in the matter of all ships, whatever their character and number, that the United States might own. Should we, then, thank Mr. Bunau-Varilla and his fellow critics for bringing within our understanding an implied guarantee in the treaty against American socialism?

With strange inadvertence, Mr. Bunau-Varilla concedes that the United States would be perfectly free to grant subsidies "once her mandate was accomplished and her expenses of interest and operation covered by their just repartition on all ships using the canal." Let us suppose the canal law, by amendment, not to exempt American vessels—this would be "the just repartition"—and let us suppose "the expenses of interest and operation covered" by the resulting income. It would then be legitimate, according to the last-quoted statement, for the United States to grant subsidies. That this surrenders the case is plain to see. To what purpose would the Government collect tolls at Colon from American ships and return the money to the ships when they reached Ancon? As the British Government maintains there is no "difference in principle between the United States charging tolls only to refund them and remitting tolls altogether."

It is a matter of notice that Mr. Bunau-Varilla, following the example of other canal law opponents, refrains from discussing the argument of the President's memorandum to Congress in which he communicated his approval of the bill. The judgment therein remains unshaken that "the British protest leads to the absurd conclusion that this Government, in constructing the canal, maintaining the canal, and defending the canal, finds itself shorn of its right to deal with its own commerce in its own way, while other nations using the canal in competition with American commerce enjoy that right and power unimpaired."

NEAL H. EWING.

NEW YORK, September 27, 1912.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I listened with interest to the eloquent and able remarks of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. He took a wide range, but gave special attention to the bill passed by the House of Representatives on the 2d day of May, 1900. It is to that portion of his speech that I intend to address my remarks. The Senator referred to that bill as the most important enactment of many years, as having abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as having conveyed a message to England which changed her policy toward the United States, and determined future engagements with reference to an isthmian canal.

The bill passed by the House of Representatives on the 2d day of May, 1900, provided, first, that the President should enter into negotiations with the Governments of Costa Rica and Nicaragua to obtain a route for an isthmian canal from the Caribbean Sea to the Pacific Ocean; second, that the Secretary of War should, under the direction of the President, proceed with the construction of such canal; third, that the sum of $140,000,000 be appropriated or authorized for doing the work.

At the very outset I wish to call attention to a very palpable inconsistency of the Senator from Michigan in regard to the relations existing between the other House and the Senate. He took up three bills—first, the tariff bill of last year; described its passage by the other House and its treatment in the Senate; and, from his remarks, it would be thought that that measure was trampled upon here, trodden out of shape; that the legislation coming from the other House was in a shapeless, chaotic mass; and that it was necessary for the Senate to give it form and vitality. In reference to the tariff bill the Senator certainly recognizes the fact that there are two branches of the legislative department of this Government.

The Senator from Michigan again referred to the currency bill and the very material modifications which were made in that measure by the Senate before it became a law. He treated it as though it had been mangled out of shape in the Senate, stating that before it became a law it was an entirely different measure from that which was considered in the other House.

The fact is, Mr. President, that sometimes the House of Representatives considers a measure more carefully, and at other times the Senate. Sometimes the other House has the last word on a measure originating here, but more frequently the Senate has the last word on a measure originating in the other House; but each alike contributes to the wisdom or unwisdom of any bill.

Reference was also made to the bill now pending, with the inference that very material modifications ought to be made in it; but the Senator from Michigan overlooked the fact that this bill of 1900, to which he assigns such supreme importance, passed the House of Representatives and never went any further. It was either torn to pieces, thrown in the furnace and burned, or, if any shred of it remained, it was buried as deep as Thor's hammer. I remember very well the passage of that bill in the other House, and I accept with pleasure the badinage of the Senator from Michigan that I was a member of a small minority who opposed it; he complimented me by saying, I believe, they gathered around me as their leader. I am very willing, Mr. President, after the lapse of a little more than 14 years, to again discuss that measure. I think the fact that it passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 224 to 36 is one of the best arguments that could be adduced that a majority is not always the best argument. Among those who voted in the negative on that bill—among the 36—were Mr. Cannon, since Speaker of the House of Representatives for four terms; Mr. Dalzell; Mr. Gillett; Mr. Lawrence; Mr. McCall; Mr. Moody, who was afterwards Secretary of the Navy, Attorney General, and a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; Mr. Littlefield, of Maine; and Mr. Champ Clark, of Missouri, now Speaker of the House of Representatives. It is a singular fact that the nucleus of the negative vote was from the States of Massachusetts and Missouri. From the State of Missouri the negative votes were cast by Mr. Clark, Mr. Cowherd, Mr. Rucker, Mr. Shackleford, and Mr. Cooney, to whom the Senator from Michigan has made such pleasing reference.

Now, let us see whether it was a very important measure; let us see whether it changed the course of things. There was hardly an idea embodied in that bill that was not afterwards rejected. First, it intended to entirely ignore the existence of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; its aim was to go ahead without clearing the diplomatic situation, without regard to our diplomatic obligations, and pass a bill for a canal to be owned and operated by the United States. It was in plain contradiction of the first section of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Whether that treaty was wise or unwise—and I must say I think of all our engagements with foreign countries that is the one of which we can say with the greatest emphasis that we obtained the worst of the bargain—the existence of that treaty was recognized at that time by all those who had given the most careful attention to the subject.

Reference was made yesterday to the fact that the then distinguished Senator from Michigan—afterwards Secretary of State—Mr. Cass, opposed and criticized this treaty. I wish to read a few words by way of quotation from Mr. Cass and from another Secretary of State, which were read when this question was under consideration in 1900 on the subject of the binding effect and the existence of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Mr. Marcy, in a letter written in 1853 to Mr. Buchanan, who was then our minister to Great Britain, said:

> In relation to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, about which so much is said in your dispatches, I have only to remark that this Government considers it a subsisting contract, and feels bound to observe its stipulations, as far as by fair construction they impose obligations upon it.

Secretary Cass, in 1858, when Secretary of State, said:

> A considerable amount of friction having arisen, the two Governments were thrown back upon their respective rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Again, in a conversation which is detailed in a letter written by Lord Lyons on the 15th of July, 1859, he spoke of certain public men as—> young and ardent politicians, who were loud in their condemnation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, who considered that the engagement not to exercise dominion over Central America was a sacrifice of interest and dignity and an unjustifiable obstacle to the fulfillment of the manifest destiny of the United States.

On two occasions in the administrations of President Grant, the latest in the month of January, 1877, this treaty was recognized as an existing obligation. An endeavor was made in the administrations of President Garfield and President Arthur to recede from its provisions, and numerous resolutions were introduced, but in 1900 it was regarded as still subsisting.

Mr. President, we might as well recognize the fact that there is a wide difference sometimes between a statesman in opposition and a statesman who has responsibility. Mr. Cass might have criticized this treaty and spoken unfavorably of it, spoken as if it were not an obligation, when he was in the opposition, but when he was Secretary of State, with the responsibility of that position, he recognized its existence.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. Would it interrupt the Senator if I would call attention to some other views as to whether that treaty was a subsisting obligation?

Mr. BURTON. I would not care to be interrupted now. I have frankly stated that the binding effect of the treaty was questioned. Mr. Blaine, Mr. Frelinghuysen, and others sought to make it appear that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was no longer in force. I think the Senator from Idaho had better take that up in his own time and in his own way. I believe he has already done so in some prior remarks.

Mr. BORAH. No; I have not called attention to that; but I thought it would be appropriate at this particular time, because the men whose views I desire to quote are not men who could be called young and enthusiastic politicians.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Idaho will recognize that I referred to Mr. Cass largely because he was quoted yesterday as opposing the validity of the treaty; at any rate, the Senate in the consideration of both of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties recognized the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 as an existing obligation the binding force of which must be admitted.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from Ohio think, if Great Britain had insisted upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as it stood, that the Senate of the United States would have recognized or felt bound by it for a single moment?

Mr. BURTON. I think they would. There is no other explanation of their course. The Senate of the United States observes its treaties with other nations, or attempts to do so.

Mr. BORAH. The Senate of the United States, through its most responsible committee, had gone upon record years before to the effect that there was no legal or moral obligation binding upon the United States by that treaty at all.

Mr. BURTON. I am perfectly aware that Senator Sherman, Senator Edmunds, and other men of prominence expressed themselves on the subject; and yet even the most eminent men have sometimes expressed themselves in regard to our foreign relations with a degree of carelessness that I think we hardly ought to imitate. When this bill was under discussion in 1900 and 1901 it was regarded as in full force.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The expression of Mr. Sherman and of the men who were associated with him, such as George F. Edmunds, William P. Frye, William M. Evarts, J. N. Dolph, John T. Morgan, Joseph E. Brown, H. B. Payne, and J. B. Eustis, expressed this opinion, not in debate, but as the result of a thorough investigation in a responsible report made to this body.

Mr. BURTON. I have the utmost respect for all those men, with nearly all of whom I was acquainted; but their opinion as expressed in that report has not been held by our State Department, save for a comparatively brief period, and it was not accepted at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaties were made in 1900 and 1901.

Second, this bill of May 2, 1900, to which such reference is made and which is regarded as the great bill, proposed to proceed with the building of an isthmian canal without waiting for the report of a commission, which was then in the field.

My friend from Michigan is plainly in error in stating that I asked in the debate of May 1 and 2, 1900, that a commission be appointed. That commission had already been appointed under the river and harbor act of March 4, 1899. It was composed of six or seven of the leading engineers of the country, both civil and military, Mr. Morison; Mr. Albert Noble; Prof. Burr, of Columbia University; Mr. Haupt, of Philadelphia; Gen. Ernst; Gen. Hains; and one or two others whose names do not come to me at this moment. That was the first commission which entered upon the work with plans for a thorough, painstaking examination of all the routes. They were instructed to examine Panama, Darien, Nicaragua, and all other possible routes, and a million dollars was appropriated for the purposes of their examination. They engaged a small army of subordinates and made surveys.

The bill of 1900 proposed to go ahead without any regard to that commission and before its report was made. It was proposed to pass the bill and proceed to expend $140,000,000 under circumstances under which the Congress would hardly have proceeded to adopt a $100,000 improvement under a rivers and harbors act. It was proposed to go ahead without knowledge, in the first place, of what was the best route, without knowledge of the probable cost and the best method of construction, without knowledge as to where locks should be located, if it were along the Nicaragua route, or how much of the total part of it should be made up of river and how much of canal.

What was done? The Senate never gave an hour's consideration to this bill passed by the House in 1900. Congress waited until that commission had made its report. It acted upon its recommendation in the selection of a route. What next? The advocates of this bill sneered at the Panama route. I remember at a later time it was argued that the declaration in the platform of the Kansas City convention in favor of a Nicaraguan canal meant the Nicaraguan route; that it did not merely mean a canal, but that it meant a particular route.

What did Congress do in this regard? They gave to the President of the United States authority to go ahead, but directed him to choose Panama in case that within a reasonable time and at a reasonable cost a satisfactory title could be obtained.

I can not, Mr. President, sympathize with the opinion that any very great degree of importance is to be given to this bill, because there is not a principle laid down in it that has not been rejected, and that, too, for the good of the country. In the first place, after mature deliberation, it was decided that it was best to have a treaty; in the next place, that this commission should make their report before we went ahead; then, that there should be some estimate of cost; and, finally, the route which the majority chose was rejected and another chosen in its place upon which this great canal has been constructed.

Mr. President, I am willing to confess to some responsibility for the opposition at that time. I am glad that the comparatively small number who stood against the passage of that bill fought the fight and went down fighting. I am glad to note that arguments were made which the country since that time has weighed, and weighed carefully; I am glad to note that the country through its respective agencies has accepted practically all the arguments and propositions put forward by the minority at that time.

I am willing also to accept the statement made by the Senator from Michigan that my opposition was, in the first instance, prompted by Secretary Hay, a man whose friendship I enjoyed and in whom I had a confidence that I have been able to give to but few men in all my life. The recollection of my acquaintance with him is and always will be one of the most pleasing of memories. Since reference has been made to his part in respect to this canal I think I am justified in saying just a few words as to what his opinions were in regard to equality of treatment in tolls.

His views were frequently expressed. It is true I never had any conversation with him in which any reference was made to coastwise shipping as distinguished from other shipping, but there is no one on this floor who in all this discussion has expressed himself more strongly or, I may say, in as strong terms as he did in those two years, 1900 and 1901, in favor of making that canal neutral and affording absolute equality to all the shipping of the world. How could he have done otherwise? Why, less than a year preceding that time he had made a demand upon the nations having spheres of influence in China for equality of treatment; he had made a demand that on the Port Arthur Railroad and the other railroads leading from Antung to Mukden, built by Russian capital, guarded by Russian police, and constructed under a concession from China, our merchandise and our citizens should have absolutely equal treatment with those of Russia. His course in that regard had been applauded by the world; it had been applauded in his own country as an achievement in diplomacy. With that fresh in his mind and fresh in the minds of the statesmen of every country with which we were dealing, where would he have been and where would the United States Government have been if it had been said "We are claiming equality with Russia and all nations on those railroads in China and Manchuria, but we are not going to give equality on a canal to be built by us at Panama"? The inconsistency of it would have cried to heaven.

Not only was that his policy, but I believe he was farsighted, for with a clear vision he looked into the future. He believed that the days of peace were nearer than ever before; that however long might be the delay, a period of greater amity and good will was coming, and not only the interest of the American people, with our expanding exports and trade, but our record as an advocate of equality in routes of transportation, demanded equality at Panama. Even more, a regard for the good name and lasting credit of the American people prompted him to make the Panama Canal, in accordance with our traditional policy to which he had so often referred, a channel which should be open to all nations alike, a trust for the world.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the discussion of the bill before the Senate has been very largely upon the interpretation of the canal treaty with Great Britain as to whether the words "all nations" meant all nations including the United States, or all other nations, leaving the United States free to act in regard to her own ships and the ships of her citizens without regard to what policy she might pursue toward the ships of the rest of the world.

That question has been argued with extraordinary ability and at great length by many of the best qualified and ablest men in the Senate, and Senators of large experience, of great learning and ability have taken exactly opposite views as to what is the correct interpretation. Such men as the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], both qualified by long experience in foreign affairs, the Senator from Massachusetts having been for many years an active member of the Committee on Foreign Relations of this body, and the Senator from New York having been Secretary of State, have opposite views as to the interpretation of this particular clause. Senators of high standing in the legal profession and of experience, such as the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and my own colleague from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], a man who has had a lifelong training upon the bench and whose natural ability and experience particularly qualify him to pass a judicial opinion upon this question, take opposite views about it.

I am not a lawyer, Mr. President. I am not trained in weighing the delicate considerations involved in a judicial settlement of such a legal question as this. It is not surprising, therefore, if upon that particular phase of the subject I have not very rigid views. Nevertheless, I am strongly inclined to agree with the opinion of my colleague, and of those who think as he does, that we as a Nation are bound to the broader interpretation of this treaty. I am influenced, perhaps, in arriving at that view by the fact that, whether or not we are so bound, I think it is the wise course for us to pursue. I believe if we had not committed ourselves at all, if we had no treaty, and were absolutely free to take any course we liked in this connection, it would be the part of wisdom for us so to treat the vessels using this canal that the merchandise of the world might appear in the various markets of the world on equal terms so far as tolls were concerned.

That is the traditional American view. It was the view as long ago as the time of Clay and Webster. It was the view in the time of Blaine. I believe it is the view that has been entertained by a large majority of the people of this country for many years; that it is the view taken by the bulk of the people of this country to-day; and that as time goes on and we gather experience in the conduct of this great achievement, we will be confirmed and strengthened in the wisdom of that policy.

But, Mr. President, when we decide that the treaty means that foreign ships are to be placed "on terms of entire equality" with our own we have not, to my mind, settled the question of our right to exempt our ships from the actual payment of tolls. That question is inextricably mixed up with the long-established custom of the world of subsidizing its ships, and it is generally admitted that there is nothing in the Panama treaty, whichever way it is interpreted, that forbids the United States or forbids any other nation from subsidizing its ships in the form of paying the canal tolls. Exempting our coastwise vessels is, in effect, simply a convenient way of paying such a subsidy to that class of vessels; but it is claimed that though the effect is the same the form is different, and that, therefore, it violates the "entire equality." This, it seems to me, is the real question that is at issue in determining our right to exempt; for if the right to subsidize is admitted, exemption is so clearly a form of subsidy that the right to use that form must be denied if our right to exempt is denied. The ground for such denial has been perhaps as clearly and concisely expressed by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] as by anyone else in this body.

I have here an extract from his speech covering that point, which I will not read in full, but which I should like to have printed in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Nor, Mr. President, is there any question here about the right of the United States to subsidize its own ships. That is as clear and as unquestionable as its right to appropriate money to put up a public building in the city of Washington. It does not rest upon our assertion, for Sir Edward Grey, the secretary of state for foreign affairs of Great Britain, in his memorandum handed to our Secretary of State on the 9th of December, 1912, says, commenting upon President Taft's memorandum accompanying the signature to the bill:

"The President argues upon the assumption that it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to place upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty an interpretation which would prevent the United States from granting subsidies to their own shipping passing through the canal, and which would place them at a disadvantage as compared with other nations. This is not the case. His Majesty's Government regard equality of all nations as the fundamental principle underlying the treaty of 1901 in the same way that it was the basis of the Suez Canal convention of 1888, and they do not seek to deprive the United States of any liberty which is open either to themselves or to any other nation; nor do they find either in the letter or in the spirit of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty any surrender by either of the contracting powers of the right to encourage its shipping or its commerce by such subsidies as it may deem expedient."

I take the line to be at the point where title to the money vests in the United States. If the construction which I feel forced to give to this treaty is a sound one, we are not at liberty to produce the result of a subsidy to American ships by relieving them of tolls which we impose upon other ships. We are not at liberty to produce the effect of a subsidy in that way; but the instant that the money paid for tolls becomes the property of the United States, becomes a part of the general fund of the United States, the United States has absolute and uncontrollable authority in the disposition of that money. All lawyers are familiar with the distinction between accomplishing an unlawful object in a lawful way and accomplishing a lawful object in an unlawful way. To subsidize American ships is lawful. However we may differ about the policy, we have the power; we have the right; but if the construction I give to this treaty is the correct one, we have excluded ourselves by solemn covenant from accomplishing that lawful result in this particular way; and if it be true that we have excluded ourselves from doing it in this particular way, it is no answer to say the same result could be accomplished in another way. In my view it is no concern of ours why Great Britain chooses to insist upon our keeping the covenant and not to produce the effect of a subsidy in that particular way. If this construction of the treaty is right, she has a right to say, "You shall not do that thing in that way"; and if we made the covenant, it is none of our affairs why she chooses to say it.

Mr. LIPPITT. In his statement of this particular aspect of the matter the Senator from New York said, in the first place, in regard to the right of the United States to subsidize its own ships—

That is as clear and as unquestionable as its right to appropriate money to put up a public building in the city of Washington.

He goes on to say that it does not rest upon our own assertion, but that Sir Edward Grey, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of Great Britain, has acknowledged that right in a clause which he quotes. He then says that the point of difference between exemption and subsidy is as follows:

I take the line to be at the point where title to the money vests in the United States. If the construction which I feel forced to give to this treaty is a sound one, we are not at liberty to produce the result of a subsidy to American ships by relieving them of tolls which we impose upon other ships. We are not at liberty to produce the effect of a subsidy in that way; but the instant that the money paid for tolls becomes the property of the United States, becomes a part of the general fund of the United States, the United States has absolute and uncontrollable authority in the disposition of that money.

The practical effect of that statement of the case, as I understand it, is that we must collect the toll from a vessel owned by an American citizen passing through the canal, but that we can, if we choose, pay it back to that vessel at any time after it comes into our possession. I suppose the situation the distinguished Senator had in his mind was that perhaps we would collect a toll at one end of the canal upon the entrance of a vessel and that we would pay it back to that vessel as it left the canal at the other end. But, Mr. President, if we have the right, having collected that money, to pay it back when the vessel leaves the canal, we have an equal right to pay it back in the middle of the canal or we have an equal right to pay it back the instant it has been received.

We would then have this situation: In order to conform to a mere technical situation upon a coastwise vessel of the United States entering the canal its master would hand to the representative of the United States Government a package conaining the amount of money necessary for the toll, receive a receipt for it, and the United States officer would immediately hand that same money back to the captain of the vessel and receive his receipt for the payment.

It seems to me that reduces the matter to an absurdity. Certainly the nations of the world could not demand that we should go through any such entirely useless form as this. It accomplishes no useful object. It is of no benefit to the commerce of any other nation using the canal. Nevertheless, if we have the right of returning this money at any time we like, undoubtedly that is the situation that would exist. Moreover, we must have the right to some such procedure to be on equal terms with the position other nations may take in regard to subsidies.

Canada, for instance, may have a great interest in paying the tolls of Canadian ships using the canal. If she should do it and we did not, she might attract a very considerable commerce from the United States; and if she subsidized, doubtless she would do it in the simplest and easiest form. The easiest form, perhaps, would be for her to have a fiscal agent at each end of the canal. Upon the arrival of one of her ships whose tonnage was known, her agent could simply hand to the representative of the American Government the money necessary to pay the tolls, and the captain, perhaps, might not even have to come ashore at all.

Mr. President, though it has been asserted that to conform to the treaty, this red tape has to be gone through with, so far as commercial vessels are concerned, the futility of it is admitted as applied to other classes of ships. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] takes that view of it. He says:

It was not necessary to specifically exempt our war vessels, even though both countries knew that the spirit of the agreement would not be abrogated by allowing our own war vessels to pass without tolls, because the payment of tolls would be but idle ceremony, the taking of money from one pocket and putting it into another, so that no intelligent nation could make complaint that we did not make the actual transfer from one pocket to the other.

Mr. President, if it would be simply an idle ceremony in the case of our war vessels—and I thoroughly agree with that statement of the case—it would be no less an idle ceremony in the case of our vessels of commerce. I can see no reason why a form that is the same in all its points is needless in the case of one class of our vessels, but is absolutely necessary in order to protect our agreement in the case of other vessels. So I think if we have the right to subsidize we have the right to exempt, provided, of course, we take the exempted tonnage into account in fixing the rate of tolls. We can not so arrange the matter that unexempted vessels would pay an additional rate because of the exemption.

But the mere fact that we have the right to do one thing or another is not in itself a reason for exercising that right. Our decision as to the course we should take on this question must be governed by other considerations than the mere fact that we have the right to exempt. I find one of those considerations in the situation in which this matter has been put by President Wilson in his very brief message of March 5, 1914, on this subject. He uses this language:

> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view.

If he had stopped there, I should probably have complied with his request; for I, too, believe it is a mistaken economic policy. When this matter was before the Senate at the time of the passage of the Panama Canal act I was not in favor of exempting our coastwise ships, or any of our ships, from the payment of canal tolls. I did not vote upon the question, because I was paired at the time with a Senator who favored exemption; but if I had had an opportunity to vote upon it I should have voted against the exemption. As a matter of economic policy I believe now that it is not wise to exempt our ships. It does not, however, seem to me that for the present, anyway, it is a very important matter from the standpoint of our domestic economy. The amount of tolls, if paid, is estimated at about $1,250,000, and that is not enough to have any great effect on our commerce either way.

But the President of the United States goes on to say, referring to the exemption:

> And is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we pass this bill there is no possibility that it will be viewed by the people of the world otherwise than as an agreement with that position of the President. Whatever view one Senator or another may have with regard to the reasons which may induce him to vote for this bill, whether based on treaty rights or domestic considerations, I thoroughly believe that in spite of any amendments we may make to the resolution that fall short of a plain declaration asserting our right to exempt our vessels from tolls the views of the other nations of the world would be that we have waived that right.

In addition to that this tolls question involves several other considerations. Great Britain, in her communications on this matter, has not confined her remarks entirely to this one question of the exemption of our coastwise vessels. She makes several other assertions in her communications to us.

She takes exception to our exempting from tolls the vessels of Panama, as we have done by treaty. She also apparently takes the view that the use of the canal by our naval vessels must be taken into consideration in fixing the rate of tolls. She makes a further statement in connection with the rate of tolls that would be allowable for us to charge that I think ought not to be left out of sight in the consideration of this question. I refer particularly to the claim she makes that in fixing just and equitable tolls we can take into account only the interest, the maintenance, and the operation of the canal.

I have not heard any mention made in this debate of that particular phase of the question, but it seems to me it is one of great importance. Interest, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, does not include profit. It means simply the amount of income that is received from bonds and securities of that kind. It does not seem to me that the United States, in fixing the basis for its tolls, is in the slightest degree limited to the mere question of the amount of interest that may be necessary to pay the yearly cost of our bond issue. In the case of the Suez Canal, which is largely owned by Great Britain—she does not quite own a majority of the shares, but comes very close to it—the tolls are fixed at a rate that for the year 1911 paid a profit of 33 per cent to the owners of that great engineering work, and for many years prior to that time the tolls had amounted to rates which paid a profit running all the way from 20 to 30 per cent.

It seems to me, therefore, that all these questions, and perhaps others, will be involved in a settlement of this matter, and that before we commit ourselves to the abandonment of any rights which we may have in regard to the canal the only proper way, the only businesslike way to proceed, is to so act that all the questions will be considered at the same time and adjusted in accordance with some common principle. It seems to me that it might very reasonably be done in the ordinary course of diplomatic conference; but if that is not possible or not successful, the former Secretary of State, Mr. Knox, proposed that there should be a commission which should take the matter under consideration, to the end that the questions of fact might be settled and the issues might be clearly defined, and he refers to the fact that a provision for such purposes had been suggested in the proposed arbitration treaty with Great Britain.

If that is not a satisfactory method, then, by all means, we should refer the question to arbitration; but when we refer it to arbitration it should be not simply the one question of the payment of coastwise tolls, but all the questions involved in our relations with the other nations of the world that have so far arisen in the discussion of this subject.

It seems to me that is the businesslike way to handle it; that is the way that will lead to the least confusion in the future; and that is the only way that will avoid our being liable in the future to be placed in a very perplexing and difficult situation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in considering this question of tolls there are many aspects, some of them startling and almost ludicrous. The Democratic platform declares "we favor exemption from tolls of American ships," and so forth. This is plain, explicit, and easily understood. The act "for opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, has this provision:

> No tolls shall be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

This enactment simply makes into law what the party had demanded at Baltimore, and the Democrats who voted for it thought they were following the platform of the party. The bill we are considering repeals this provision absolutely, and the President asks us to pass it on the ground that it is a subsidy and therefore contrary to time-honored Democratic principles. He said that it "constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view." The party has grown old in opposing subsidies. From its very origin it has been against such a policy. In a speech in New Jersey, which has been often quoted and thrown in our teeth, the President explained the object of this plank and indorsed it fully—not only indorsed it, but praised it for the service it would render the farmers of the country. In that same speech the President also said, "Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means what it says." It will be hard to make the average voter understand the contradiction and seeming betrayal of the people in not carrying out our pledges. Democratic candidates in the next election will be kept busy explaining and apologizing, which is very uncomfortable to have to do.

The plank in the platform about the merchant marine reads as follows:

> We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

This language, too, is plain and explicit; but to some minds why the ideas are inconsistent and destroy each other is hard to see. We alone built the canal and have spent $400,000,000 in its construction, and many people feel that our country ought to get all the benefit possible from it for its citizens. We have spent hundreds of millions on other improvements to canals, rivers, and harbors for the public welfare, and they are free to all the world. Why should we levy tolls on this one only? The canal, broadly speaking, is merely an extension of our coast line by joining the two oceans together. Why exact tolls from our citizens for passing through it, then? The only argument why American ships going through the canal should pay tolls like ships of other nations is either because of our treaty obligations or because all the people can not enjoy the benefit alike. In the very nature of things all the taxpayers in the United States can not enjoy the same privileges in regard to the canal as those owning ships do. It was a national enterprise, undertaken primarily on account of the United States Navy. The object lesson presented by the long and dangerous voyage of the Oregon from our western coast around Cape Horn during the Spanish-American War, only arriving just in time to participate in the Battle of Santiago, had much to do with hurrying up the construction of the canal. It required the united efforts of all the people of our country to furnish the money to carry this gigantic work to a success. But for its national importance it would not have been undertaken by this Government alone. The upkeep of the canal will require a deal of money, to say nothing of guarding it. It will be many years before money received from tolls will come near equaling the expenses to maintain the canal and provide a sinking fund. Whether the remission of tolls would be a subsidy or not is not worth while to argue. If we remit the tolls entirely to our coastwise ships, those owning them would get the benefit of the Nation's bounty and have the enjoyment of special favors which all the people can not have. This is the policy of Republican protection, and the Democracy has declared that policy to be "robbery."

We hear much about a "shipping trust," but the most complete monopoly in the United States at this time is our coastwise trade. Not a passenger or a pound of freight can be carried from one port to another in the United States except in an American-built ship. Our navigation laws need mending as much as, indeed more than, this law which we propose to repeal; and I would gladly support an amendment to allow vessels built abroad and purchased by our citizens to obtain American registry and enter into our coastwise trade. We created the Shipping Trust by this favoritism. If our people can buy just as good ships as we can have built at home, far cheaper, why not allow them to do it? To my mind, it is absurd and outrageous not to do so. All the trusts in America owe their origin to this same cause.

The protective tariff has been the nursing mother to monopolies, and is the fruitful source of many inequalities and injustices which now exist. We ought to do away with the last vestige of it, and in order to do so we will have to make radical changes in our navigation laws. Indeed, I believe that it is the thing we ought to do at this very time. We pass resolutions and put planks in a platform about the merchant marine, but we do nothing practical.

While the American flag used to float from the mastheads of our wooden ships in all the seas of the world, we do not seem to be able to compete with foreigners in building ships of steel or in running them. In those good old days when our commerce was so flourishing, the "Yankee clipper" was famous throughout the world; but our New England friends, having found they could persuade the Congress of this country to "protect" them, immediately set about concocting schemes to rob the balance of the people for their special benefit, and we are keeping it up until this day. I am bound to believe that it is the paramount duty of the Democracy, now, while it is working upon the bad laws passed by our Republican predecessors, to take care that this one particular law shall no longer hamper and throttle our commerce. We should be able to build ships as cheaply in the United States as they are built abroad, just as we can make armor here as cheaply as they can anywhere; and why not do it? While we have revised the tariff downward in no uncertain way, and changed the law in many particulars, the policy of protection is still allowed to control in too many things. We are forever confronted with some of the deviltry which has thus grown up, giving one class of citizens favors and compelling the balance of us to pay tribute to those favorites.

The debate on this question of tolls has been very able and has been conducted in admirable spirit and temper, but the question is kaleidoscopic and more difficult to unravel than any other with which we have had to deal this session. I admire the President very much. I believe he is entirely loyal to the public welfare and to the party's interests as he understands them. His patriotism and integrity of purpose can not be doubted for one instant. Well-nigh all the people trust him, and most Democrats are learning to love him more and more. He will go down in history as one of our greatest Presidents. If he succeeds in emancipating the white people of this country from the thraldom to money and bonds, where the Republican Party has placed them, he will deserve and occupy a place alongside of Lincoln in the estimation of posterity. I have felt that as the first Democrat in half a century—real Democrat I mean, for I never regarded Cleveland as a Democrat—it is the duty of every man who claims to be a Democrat to support him in all his policies, wise or unwise. If he makes blunders, let us all make blunders and stand shoulder to shoulder and fight it out on that line and go down together. This has been my policy and desire since his inauguration.

But it does stagger my common sense, and I have been unable to understand just why he projected this fight into the party at this time. The canal will not be completed and ready for use until 1915. He could have waited until the regular session next year and then brought the issue to a test. There was every argument in favor of delay. It is of great importance to the Democratic Party to control the House of Representatives at the next election, and I believe the President should have kept quiet until that election was over. It would have been the best statesmanship as well as the best politics to have done so. Until this issue was pressed to the front the course of Democracy had been onward and upward. While the opposition was intense and bitter, it was hopeless and helpless. This is the first jolt or check it has received. I do not believe in the Machiavellian principle of politics—deception and hypocrisy—but there would have been neither displayed in remaining quiet. There was wisdom in silence and it would have been "golden." This question was not a burning issue at the time when he read his message in the House of Representatives to the joint assembly. There are so many things of more importance that the Democrats ought to do, that I must say, in my opinion, it was a great blunder on the part of the President—and I say it with all due respect—to have precipitated this fight now. The Democratic Party instead of presenting a solid, united front is split into contending factions.

While the Republicans, too, disagree on this important subject, both wings of that party—I mean the Progressives and "standpatters"—are smiling complacently at the division in the Democratic ranks. They had well-nigh given up all hope as far as the next election goes. Now they are pricking up their ears and scenting victory from afar. I have been glad to see what while Democrats are very earnest there has been no anger or bad temper shown, and I feel safe in saying that, whatever the result of this contest may be, after the vote is had a solid Democracy will move forward behind the President and try to redeem all our party pledges. It would be almost a crime for the Democracy to hesitate now and not finish cleansing the "Augean stable." We can not hope under the rules of the Senate to pass very much constructive legislation during the short session. If we lose the next House, all the reforms so necessary would have to be done between December and March. An extra session, with one branch of Congress controlled by the Republicans, would only be able to pass the appropriation bills. The Democracy should make hay while the sun shines, and I am glad to see the President pressing the anti-trust legislation so vigorously. I am sorry that he did not include rural credits in the legislative program. He will have to face much criticism on account of his failure to redeem his promise made last winter just after the passage of the banking and currency law that this would be done. The farmers are a mighty power, who are just beginning to understand what their real interests are.

The question of "What is a Democrat?" and "What is Democracy?" are being earnestly asked, for our boasts that the platform was not "molasses to catch flies" accentuates the inconsistency and apparent betrayal. Men who are perfectly honorable and loyal to the truth are explaining why they are voting to reverse their action on the tolls matter. Even the "Bull Moosers" are growing hopeful and boasting. Theodore Roosevelt, the great Advertiser, has returned from Brazil, and, true to his nature, he is "dee-lighted" to see how much the newspapers make of him. Of course those familiar with his methods know that he is furnishing a great deal of the "copy" and some of his friends are paying for this free advertising.

When David B. Hill, the great and distinguished predecessor of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], in opening the Democratic campaign at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn in 1885, said, "I am a Democrat," it was startling because of its simplicity and triteness, and evoked a loud outburst of laughter and applause. The cartoonists of the Republican press took it up and had much fun at his expense.

Should Senator O'GORMAN in the coming campaign address an audience on the same spot he, too, could say, "I am a Democrat," and could point to his long and distinguished services as a leader of the party in his city and State. But he would have difficulty in explaining just what a Democrat is, and would be twitted with a number of questions that can be asked about this canal matter. Some will ask why two planks so antagonistic were put in the platform and how they got there? Whose fault was it that Democracy is thus made a spectacle in the eyes of the people of the country? The Senator from Montana, who acted as secretary to the subcommittee which finally drafted the platform into words, has told us all about the discussions in that committee and how this plank came to be there. The President himself told me frankly that when he made his speech in New Jersey explaining and praising this plank he did not know its real meaning and that he had never studied its full effects. And I am bound to believe Mr. Bryan was also napping, though he was the most alert man in the Baltimore convention that I saw there and was so agile, virile, and vigorous as to astonish his old friends as well as his enemies. We have from high authority that—

Even the worthy Homer sometimes nods.

And we must charitably suppose that both the President and his Secretary of State were caught napping—the one when the plank slipped into the Baltimore platform, the other when he made a speech praising it.

I had made up my mind, however, to vote against the repeal of this law, preferring that we should arbitrate the matter with Great Britain, if necessary, rather than be chargeable justly with bad faith in keeping a treaty. I still believe this would have been the best way out of the dilemma. The testimony is so conflicting on what the treaty really means and what are our obligations under it, and so many good men and able lawyers differ honestly in regard to it, that I thought it better to submit it to the judgment of an unbiased jury and abide the result. To me it seems that it would be better to submit to arbitration, even though we knew we should lose the case, than be made a laughingstock, as we now are. If we, as a nation, have lost caste with other nations, as is hinted rather than asserted, because of our action on this canal matter, it would certainly be less mortifying to have the other nations join with Great Britain in telling us so, than voluntarily to declare that we wanted to take advantage of England contrary to our treaty obligations, and were shamed into decency by the public opinion of the world.

Then, too, there was a peculiar condition, personal or local in its nature, which embarrassed me very much.

Senators will remember that in 1902, while Hon. John L. McLaurin was a Senator from South Carolina, he and I came to blows on the floor of this Chamber, because I had charged him with selling out to the Republicans on the Spanish treaty, which charge he denied with bitterness and called me a liar. This I promptly resented with a blow. Some of the older Senators who witnessed the scene are yet with us; but I do not propose to go into any further details. I merely mention it in order to explain why it is embarrassing for me to vote for this repeal. At the next State Democratic convention following the encounter between McLaurin and myself I urged and succeeded in having passed by the convention a provision changing the constitution and rules of the party in South Carolina so as to require each candidate for the Senate and House to subscribe to the following pledge. This is the pledge that every candidate for the House and for the Senate in South Carolina has to take to-day:

> I will support the political principles and policies of the Democratic Party during the term of office for which I may be elected, and work in accord with my Democratic associates in Congress on all party questions.

I wanted to tie his hands.

This was made for McLaurin, and everybody understood why. While his betrayal of his trust was very flagrant and fully warranted my characterization of it, it was no more clear and explicit than this question of tolls, for where will we look for "Democratic policies and principles" if not in the party platform? Where will we get plainer language than the pledge at Baltimore on this subject? There has been no caucus of Senators or Democrats to determine what is the party policy. The platform says one thing; and the President has indorsed and praised the platform and explained that very thing in a speech. No authoritative repeal or disavowal of the platform at Baltimore has been uttered by anyone, and Democrats everywhere are very much muddled. The President alone urges the repeal, because, in his judgment, it is necessary to maintain our honor as a Nation.

I would be very unhappy if McLaurin could justly charge me with prescribing physic for him which I myself am unwilling to take. Should I fail to stand by the party platform and vote for the repeal, he could justly say that I am inconsistent. I have always prided myself on my frankness and bluntness in speaking just what I believe to be true. The predicament we are now in has caused me more worry than anything that has happened in a long while.

We have just had another State convention of the Democratic Party of South Carolina, and that convention indorsed President Wilson's administration in no uncertain terms. Indeed, it went further than good taste or truth seemed to demand or allow. It said:

> Recognizing in the President the greatest moral force that has been in the White House during the past century, we heartily commend his efforts to secure a repeal of the Panama free-tolls act, a law enacted by a Republican Congress and signed by a Republican President regardless of national honor. We condemn this law as undemocratic and against the economic policy of our party and country. We believe that this law would create a shipping trust and would repeat the outrageous scandals of the building of our transcontinental railways. We demand that our Senators vote for the unqualified repeal of this act, and thus support the President in upholding Democratic principles and the honor of this Nation.

I want it distinctly understood that political considerations have not influenced me one iota, because I have five years more to serve, if I live, and I do not have to appear before my people until my time is out. I will die, I expect, before that, but I do not intend to die until I am obliged to, and my health, as you all can see, is very good and improving slowly every day.

It seems to me that this resolution is much exaggerated, and a milder and more conservative utterance would have been in better taste. Woodrow Wilson is recognized by all as a great statesman and a good man, but his best friends will not claim for him infallibility, and he has too much sense to listen to flattery. He has acknowledged to me that he had never studied that plank in the platform nor analyzed it, and was led to indorse it and praise it because the party at Baltimore had put it in our platform. He is a great exponent of Democratic principles, but even he, when reading such resolutions as our State convention passed, must remember that there have been many great Democrats in the "past century"; that Madison, Monroe, and Jackson have been Presidents during that time, to say nothing of Lincoln. Therefore I know he will agree with my criticism.

Democracy, according to my definition, is a government by the people, speaking through a majority; and as all the people can not assemble in one body at one time, they can act only through their representatives. Therefore a Democrat means a man elected by the people, who obeys the people and serves their interests honestly and equally. Equality of opportunity and equality of burden is as fundamental a principle of Democracy as local self-government or State rights.

I know the repeal of this bill is right because it is in accordance with old Democratic principles, and I am glad the party leaders have returned to the beaten paths and will stand by those principles for which our party has always stood.

This trouble about the Baltimore platform only shows the vital importance of the work done by the committee in our national conventions and the very watchful care that ought to be taken to prevent "jokers" from being incorporated in such important papers.

The delegates to the Baltimore convention from South Carolina in 1912 stood by Woodrow Wilson from first to last, and I believe the support our State gave him is largely to be credited with his triumphant nomination. Therefore, in a peculiar sense he is South Carolina's more than he is Georgia's or North Carolina's President, and our people love him.

Like the good Democrat he is, at first he fell in line and tried to explain and defend this exemption of American ships from paying tolls. He saw it in the platform and, of course, thought it was right; but the moment he analyzed it he saw the pernicious and wrong ideas it contained, and has had the courage to lead the party back to the pathway of duty to the people—a majority of the people, not favorites and those who are to be especially looked after and cared for. That is Republican doctrine, not Democratic, and I am glad that we propose to spew it out of our mouths. I shall, therefore, vote for the repeal, notwithstanding the Democratic platform.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the issue involved in this controversy is clear cut and unmistakable. It is not so obscure as seems to be the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty out of which it has arisen. It is simply this: Shall we repeal the act exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of canal tolls? This issue, however, involves five distinct, yet related, questions: First, Is the remission of tolls equivalent to the granting of a subsidy? Second, Is the granting of a subsidy just as a matter of principle and wise as a matter of policy? Third, Is the Democracy bidden and bound by its platform to support such a subsidy? Fourth, Is the Government of the United States forbidden by treaty obligation to grant such a subsidy or discrimination? And fifth, Which is paramount—a platform promise or a treaty obligation?

Mr. President, that the remission of tolls is equivalent to a subsidy has not, indeed, been controverted. To ask that question is to answer it. No one would deny that, if the Government should first collect tolls and then return them to the shipowners, that would constitute a subsidy. The character of the transaction is not changed by the circumstance that the shipowners are allowed to retain the tolls in the first instance. The effect upon the General Treasury is the same. The effect upon the private treasury of the shipping concerns is the same. In both instances the shipowners receive and enjoy the money, and the people are taxed to supply the deficiency thus occasioned. That, sir, involves every element of subsidy.

We are not, however, left to mere speculation or to abstract reasoning upon this point. The whole matter is concluded by the very highest authority. Former President Taft, in a speech delivered in January last, used this conclusive language:

> The idea of Congress in passing the bill and my idea in signing it was that we were thus granting a subsidy to our coastwise vessels.

No one will deny that, for once at least, former President Taft did not err. But, sir, I cite even a higher authority, an authority more commanding and more convincing. I refer to the senior Senator from the State of New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. That Senator has been the avowed apostle, he has been the acknowledged champion, of ship subsidy these many years. He has advocated such a policy certainly in season and, as some think, out of season. He was the chairman, I believe, of the Merchant Marine Commission; he prepared and submitted an elaborate report recommending that the Government of the United States subsidize its vessels engaged in foreign commerce. I do not recall that he recommended a subsidy to our coastwise vessels.

During this debate my colleague [Mr. OWEN] asked the Senator from New Hampshire if the remission of tolls was not equivalent to the granting of a subsidy, and that Senator, with his accustomed candor, answered, "It is exactly the same thing." He did not say that it was the same in effect; he did not say it was analogous to a subsidy; but he said, with perfect truth, "It is exactly the same thing." Mr. President, it is the same thing. Both are gratuities out of the Public Treasury in behalf of private enterprise.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I believe, Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma quotes me accurately. I know he intends to do so, and I have every reason to believe he does.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I answered the question of the Senator's colleague frankly and squarely and without equivocation or qualification, that, according to the interpretation given to subsidies by the Democratic Party, this remission of tolls is a subsidy.

The Senator from Oklahoma says that in the report submitted by the Merchant Marine Commission, of which I was chairman, no mention was made of subsidies to coastwise ships.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I said that I did not recall that there was.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, Mr. President, no mention was made of that, for the reason that our coastwise ships are protected by laws that have been on the statute books for a hundred years against competition with foreign ships. My only contention as to coastwise ships passing through the Panama Canal is that that is an American waterway, and that they have the same right of exemption from competition with foreign ships there that they have in other American waters.

The Senator from Oklahoma will recall the fact that I have heretofore suggested that we are constantly voting subsidies in bills which we are passing here from day to day that are less defensible than any subvention which we are giving our coastwise ships by the legislation of Congress. I did not mean to use that term exactly in the connection which the Senator applies it; I meant if the Democratic contention regarding subsidies was correct that this was as much a subsidy as are certain other things that we are voting from day to day, and I stand by that proposition. We are now, according to the Senator's interpretation of a subsidy, subsidizing our ships in the foreign trade. Under the provisions of the act of 1891, commonly known as the ocean-mail act, we are granting relief to our ships engaged in the over-seas trade to a certain extent beyond what they are earning by carrying our mails; but unless we gave them that relief we would not even have the few ships that we to-day have engaged in the over-seas trade. I think we have only 10 or 11 such ships altogether.

The last bill that I reported to the Senate and advocated was a bill proposing to increase the postal subvention to a small amount, so that we might keep the vessels engaged in the over-seas trade, especially those on the Pacific Ocean, which were then tied up at the docks at San Francisco rotting at their anchors, regularly on the route to the Orient and Australasia. Two or three of those vessels are now running across the Pacific, because little New Zealand is adding a subvention to the small amount of postal subvention that we are granting to those ships. If it were not that New Zealand, a colony of Great Britain, is adding something to what we are allowing the ships that are sailing across the Pacific Ocean to Australasia to-day, those ships would be tied up at the docks in San Francisco.

I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for permitting me to interrupt him to say this much.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GORE. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from New Hampshire, who has given so much thought to this very important question. If the ships to which the Senator alludes and which are now aided in part by New Zealand did not have that aid and were tied up at the docks in San Francisco, what would be our postal facilities with New Zealand and that part of the world?

Mr. GALLINGER. We would be absolutely dependent on foreign ships, as we are to-day, practically, in our postal facilities with South America.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is what I supposed.

Mr. GALLINGER. When our Government wants to transmit our official dispatches to our ambassadors in any of the capitals of South America they are sent to Europe and there transshipped. Our official correspondence goes in that way, largely because we have no adequate ships going to South America.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator know of any other maritime nation dependent upon the foreigner as we are in this respect?

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely none. The President of the United States did me the honor the other day to quote almost exactly a sentence which I used in a speech I made in this Chamber two years ago, or thereabouts, in which I said that if a commercial house depended upon its rivals to deliver its goods disaster would come to the house thus dependent upon its rivals; and that is as true to-day as it was when uttered.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Without entering into a discussion of subsidies or of the merits of the legislation referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire, granting what he calls postal subsidies to ships carrying mail between San Francisco and Australasia—passing the merits of all that by for the present, I am curious to know, after listening to what the Senator from New York has just said, whether that Senator favors a policy of ship subsidies. What he has said would seem to indicate that he does.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, there has been no declaration of the Democratic Party at a national convention in many years that has not contained a pledge that the Democratic Party favored legislation which would tend to a revival of the merchant marine of this country. If the distinguished Senator from Missouri knows of any way in which the merchant marine of this country can be restored, except by bounties, subventions, or subsidies, I should be glad to have the benefit of his knowledge or judgment on that subject.

Mr. STONE. The Senator has not answered my question. Does the Senator from New York believe in granting subventions or subsidies to promote the maritime interests of this country?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I regret that I am compelled to reply that the distinguished Senator from Missouri shows no disposition to answer the question that I ventured to address to him.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Just a moment. I think our merchant marine can be resuscitated without granting subsidies. I think I could give good reasons for that faith. But, of course, Mr. President, to enter upon that and elaborate it would take considerable time, which I can not consume at this juncture and in the time of the Senator from Oklahoma. I am against subsidies; and I contend that they are not necessary to the restoration of our merchant marine. The Senator from New York must mean, if he means anything by what he has said, that he stands here as an advocate of ship subsidies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rather regret, Mr. President, that this discussion has been precipitated, because I am very anxious, for one, to vote on the bill that is under consideration. I will suggest to my learned friend from Missouri, however, that there is a bill now before the Committee on Commerce, of which he is a very prominent member——

Mr. STONE. I am not a member of that committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought the Senator was.

Mr. STONE. I was, but I am not now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I will suggest to the Committee on Commerce that there is a bill before that great committee, introduced by me at an early day in the present session, proposing to increase the mail subvention under the act of 1891, known as the ocean mail act, and if the committee will report that bill out, either adversely or favorably, we can then have a discussion of this subsidy question, in which I shall be very glad to participate. The fact is that under the ocean mail act of 1891 we are now giving subvention to our ships engaged in the overseas trade, and no Democrat, so far as I know, has risen in this Chamber at any time to say that he wants to repeal that act.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Oklahoma——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GORE. I yield; yes, sir.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator from Missouri states that there are methods by which the American marine may be resuscitated without granting subsidies. He refrains from indicating what they are, suggesting that it would occupy too much time of the Senate if he were to dwell at length upon those methods. I am in favor of any necessary legislation that will bring about a revival of the merchant marine. The flag of the United States is not seen upon any ocean in the world except the flag that is carried upon about 11 ships on the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans. Two years ago 3,000 vessels passed through the Suez Canal flying the British flag, while during that entire year but 2 ships flying the American flag passed through that canal.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from New York one further object lesson? We have spent $15,000,000, or thereabouts, on the harbor of Galveston, Tex., and the waterways connected therewith; there is an enormous foreign trade going out of that port, but there is just one lone American schooner carrying the American flag out of Galveston engaged in foreign trade. What a spectacle that is, my fellow Senators!

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I have never declared that I was in favor of granting subsidies; I am not in favor of granting subsidies as a means of restoring the merchant marine if, as stated by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, there are other ways of restoring the navigation which was once enjoyed by the United States upon the oceans of the world. If there are other ways of restoring the American merchant marine, what excuse has our party for its failure to redeem the pledges which we have made time and time again in our national platforms?

To-day the American merchant marine is prostrate. It is humiliating for an American to be compelled to confess that, although there was a time in our history when we carried in our own American bottoms 89 per cent of the products of this country, now and for years past we have been dependent upon the foreign shipowner for the carriage of our products from this country and for the carriage of our imports into this country.

Much as we declaimed for a number of years against the burdens of the Payne-Aldrich tariff act, and claimed that it imposed a tribute of $300,000,000 annually upon the American people, it is undisputed that for years we have been paying to the foreign shipowners—we, the American people—$300,000,000 annually; and no efficient effort seems to be made to change this condition and give our great country the boast and the prestige enjoyed by other nations, of having a merchant marine of our own.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator states that our platforms in the past have advocated a revival of the American merchant marine. Is it not true that those platforms say that, while they do advocate such a revival, it must be done without giving a subsidy or a bounty out of the Public Treasury?

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is true, Mr. President; but the distinguished Senator from Missouri states that there are ways of restoring the merchant marine without resorting to bounties, subsidies, or subventions. I hope that at some time in the near future the Senator from Missouri will explain in some detail how that can be done.

Mr. STONE. And the Senator from New York thinks there is no other way.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have not expressed that opinion.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator has not expressed that opinion, he has not expressed any.

Mr. JAMES. Whether there are other ways or not, the Democratic Party has said in its platforms that if the only way to revive it is by a subsidy or a bounty, we are opposed to it. That is the Democratic position, as set forth in all our platforms.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, this has been a most luminous and most interesting digression; but neither the Senator from New Hampshire nor the Senator from New York has indicated how a subsidy to our coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal would restore the Stars and Stripes to the high seas. I will yield to a further interruption from either Senator to volunteer that valuable information.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say in reply that I have never made that contention. What I have said, and what I will now repeat, is that as our coastwise vessels are protected from competition with those of foreign nations, and they are allowed to carry goods around Cape Horn from New York to San Francisco, Portland, Oreg., Seattle, and Hawaii without any foreign competition being permitted, manifestly they have a right to pass through the American waterway known as the Panama Canal, which shortens the distance to California, Portland, Hawaii, and Seattle. That is the only contention I have ever made. In other words, I believe the Panama Canal is exclusively an American waterway, which we have a right to administer in our own way.

Mr. GORE. I shall refer to that subject a moment later.

I share the regrets expressed by the Senator from New York and the Senator from New Hampshire as to the disappearance of the American flag from the seven seas. That flag never will be restored to its former glorious position until our antiquated navigation laws are repealed.

Mr. President, it is true that other nations subsidize their vessels engaged in foreign commerce. It is true that other nations tax their people to pay our freight. Against that policy I enter no protest; but I am not willing to tax the American people and subsidize our seagoing vessels in order to pay or to reduce the freight of the foreigner.

I am not aware that any nation grants a subsidy to the vessels engaged exclusively in its coastwise commerce. As far as I know, this is a new subsidy under the sun.

I do not intend, however, to embark upon a general discussion of the subject of ship subsidies. That grain and that chaff have been winnowed often in the Senate. Both the subject and the Senate have been exhausted time and time again "with vain repetition." I come immediately to the question before us: Shall we grant this subsidy to our coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal?

It is estimated that the cost of maintenance, operation, and interest charges in connection with the Panama Canal will aggregate some fifteen and a quarter million dollars yearly. It is also estimated that the tolls paid by our coastwise commerce would amount to $1,200,000. Now, sir, the question is, Shall the people pay this $1,200,000, or shall the shipowners who use the canal pay this $1,200,000?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The estimate that the coastwise vessels passing through the canal would pay $1,200,000 a year by way of tolls was based upon the number of vessels engaged in our coastwise trade before the passage of the Panama Canal act, in August, 1912.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amount is really immaterial. The principle is the vital point.

Mr. O'GORMAN. With the permission of the Senator from Oklahoma, I should like to occupy just a moment longer.

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. By the act passed in August, 1912, all railroad-controlled and all trust-controlled vessels in the coastwise trade were excluded from the use of the canal; and it has been estimated by a committee of the House that the ships thus excluded represent 92 per cent of all the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of this country. Out of the remaining 8 per cent which would be permitted to use the Panama Canal, it is estimated by the Commissioner of Navigation, Mr. Chamberlain, that there are but 33 American ships in the coastwise trade of the United States that can make use of the Panama Canal, and the probable amount paid in the course of a year by 33 ships using the Panama Canal if tolls were charged would not exceed $250,000 or $300,000.

Under the method that is approved and sanctioned by those who support the repeal there would be a deficit each year of $17,000,000 borne by the taxpayers of the United States, and the ships of Great Britain, representing one-half of all the navigation of the world, will have the benefit of one-half of that deficit, which will be $8,500,000.

No complaint is made of that princely benefaction which the American Treasury is offering for the benefit of British shipping, yet in this body there are voices raised in protest against the suggestion that in order to promote and encourage our own American shipping it is proper to allow it to have in an indirect way the benefit of $250,000 or $300,000 in a year.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to say a word at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not agree with the figures given by the Senator from New York. I discussed that matter in some observations I made a few days ago, and I shall not repeat them in detail now. The estimate of 92 per cent, made by the chairman of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, referred only to the regular lines of steamers. Suppose, however, half a million dollars would cover the annual loss because of the exemption from tolls of our coastwise ships, which is quite probable, if my mathematics are at all correct that would be a tax of half a cent on every man, woman, and child in the United States—a very small subsidy as compared to the subsidies that we voted in the Agricultural appropriation bill, of which the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma had charge.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York is correct in the assertion that the tolls would aggregate $200,000 instead of $1,200,000 yearly, then, sir, the more is the shame that we should barter our principles and surrender our convictions for such a miserable mess of pottage as that.

Without reference to the amount, whether it be $1,200,000 or $200,000, this is the question: Shall we exempt the people and tax the ships or shall we exempt the ships and tax the people to maintain this canal?

That, sir, is the question. For my part, I cast my choice with the people. I would not consent to remit these tolls if I knew that the benefits of such a remission would be shared equally by the producers and the consumers using the canal. I would not consent to the remission of these tolls if I knew that the benefits would be transferred to the producer in the form of higher prices upon what he sells, or transferred to the consumer in the form of lower prices upon what he buys. Why tax the American people in order to lavish this favor upon any class of consumers or any class of producers merely because their goods chance to pass through this canal?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I am constrained to inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma what policy he would advocate with reference to the Soo Canal or the Erie Canal?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not intend to detour at this time through either one of those canals. I am addressing myself now to this particular subsidy, which, unfortunately, has the support of the distinguished Senator from Montana, for whom I entertain the highest admiration.

I do not believe the benefits of this exemption would be shared in any measure either by the producers or by the consumers of this country. Those benefits would be absorbed by our coastwise shipping monopoly, which already has been loaded down with favors at the hands of the National Government. Water transportation is so cheap in its nature that the coastwise vessels could underbid the transcontinental railroads for the competitive traffic.

It is true, as the Senator from New Hampshire asserted, that our coastwise vessels to-day enjoy exclusive privileges. They constitute an absolute, a universal, an ironclad, and an airtight monopoly. Many people do not know how absolute this monopoly is. Many American citizens do not know that no foreign vessel can engage in our coastwise commerce. Many do not know that the proudest English ship that sails the sea can not receive a bale of cotton at Galveston and deliver that bale of cotton at New York. That is reserved for our favorite coastwise shipping. Many people do not know that no ship flying the German flag can take on a bolt of calico at Boston and "deliver the goods" at New Orleans. That, sir, is reserved to the coastwise monopoly, a legalized monopoly, a statutory trust, and the violation of its privileges is a crime under the laws of the land.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator is on a theme that touches me very closely, because I have introduced an amendment opening the coastwise business of the United States to the ships of all nations. In view of the fact that the present coastwise business is so thoroughly monopolized, as the Senator describes, I wish to ask him if he will not give his support in helping to break that monopoly?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I never differ from the Senator from Missouri when the Senator is right, and the Senator is nearly always right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. When I differ from him I suspect the correctness of my own views and my own position. In this instance I do not differ. I think that every ship that sails the seas ought to be allowed to receive cargoes at New York and discharge them at San Francisco. Then the monopoly will be undone and coastwise freight rates will be reasonable. I would not do so overnight. I think the change should be gradual, so as to avoid needless dislocation and allow time for readjustment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator think if we put our coastwise vessels in competition with foreign vessels that the coastwise industry would share the same fate that has come to our over-seas shipping?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that is exactly the reason why I suggested the limitation in answering the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me one further word, I did not quite understand what the Senator from Missouri said. Did he say that he had offered an amendment to some bill touching the repeal of our coastwise legislation?

Mr. REED. I offered an amendment to this bill March 28.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then we will have an opportunity to vote on that question, I apprehend.

Mr. REED. I hope you will.

Mr. GALLINGER. So do I. I was about to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that, holding the view he does, I have wondered that he or some other good Democrat did not offer a provision repealing the coastwise laws of the United States, which have been on the statute books for a century. No such bill has been introduced during my service, and I was wondering why it was not done. The Senator from Missouri now states that he has offered an amendment which will accomplish that purpose if agreed to. So we will get a vote on the proposition, and I am glad of it, the result of which, I feel sure, will not be what the Senator from Missouri desires.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Government has not only invested our coastwise ships with monopolistic power, but it has permitted the abuse of that power.

Compare the freight rates between our coastwise vessels and vessels that are obliged to meet the competition of the world.

Bagging from New York to New Orleans is 35 cents a hundred; from Liverpool to New Orleans, 17½ cents a hundred. The rate on wire and on cotton ties from New York to New Orleans is 35 cents; from Liverpool to New Orleans, 13½ cents a hundred. The distance from Liverpool to New Orleans is three times as great as from New York to New Orleans, yet the coastwise rate is three times as much as the foreign rate.

Sir, that is not all. Take the rate on plows. From New York to Wilmington, a distance of 550 miles, the rate is 15 cents a hundred pounds; to New Orleans, 35 cents a hundred; to Argentine ports, 6,000 miles away, 49½ cents a hundred; to Cape Town, in South Africa, 42 cents a hundred; and to Shanghai, 12,500 miles away, 58 cents a hundred.

Compare the rate on dry goods. From New York to Wilmington, 550 miles, 50 cents a hundred; to New Orleans, 1,700 miles, 70 cents a hundred; to Shanghai, 12,500 miles away, 60 cents a hundred. Shanghai is twenty times as far from New York as Wilmington, yet the rate is only 10 cents a hundred more, and it is 10 cents less a hundred to Shanghai than to New Orleans.

Mr. President, of course competitive conditions affect these rates in some measure, but they do not justify and they do not account for this enormous disparity.

Now, the Congress of the United States is asked to confer an additional subsidy on this favored monopoly at the expense of the overburdened taxpayers.

Mr. O'GORMAN and Mr. WEEKS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield, and to whom?

Mr. GORE. I yield to either Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I simply want to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he is not aware that the coastwise shipping to which he has just been referring is coastwise shipping controlled by the railroads and by the trusts in the aggregate of 92 per cent of all the American coastwise shipping, and the remainder will be the shipping that under the statute of 1912 may use the canal?

Mr. GORE. The Senator from New York is in error as to his figures. The figures which the Senator cites relate to the line tonnage of the United States, and aggregate, I believe, something like a million tons, whereas the total coastwise tonnage of the United States, including the tramp ships, is six millions. The Senator from New Hampshire may correct me.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I presume the best-informed public official on the subject——

Mr. GORE. Is the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and I refer the Senator from New York to him.

Mr. O'GORMAN. On the subject to which the Senator is addressing himself is the Commissioner of Navigation, Mr. Chamberlain, and it is his evidence given before our committee that I have been substantially quoting in the remark I addressed a moment ago to the Senator from Oklahoma. I reiterate that of the twenty-five or twenty-seven thousand ships of all classes embraced in the coastwise trade of the United States, 92 per cent of them are owned or controlled by the railroads and by corporations operated in defiance of the antitrust law, and are excluded from the use of the canal whether they pay tolls or not, by the act of 1912; and of the 8 per cent of the coastwise ships that may use the canal, the Commissioner of Navigation, Mr. Chamberlain, states that they aggregate but 33 which are suitable for use through the canal.

Mr. GORE. The last phrase the Senator uses modifies his remark. I think possibly the Senator from New Hampshire has the statistics at his desk as to the line companies; that is, the railway vessels and the consolidated shipping companies' vessels. There are many vessels belonging to other concerns.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. The statistics that I have collated, and I have taken great pains to have them accurate, show that there are only 330 steamers, of 808,741 gross tons, which are engaged in the regular line service.

Mr. GORE. That is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is only about one-eighth of the entire number of coastwise ships. Of all kinds, sail and otherwise, there are 27,070 vessels of 7,886,578 gross tons which were enrolled licensed vessels engaged in the coastwise trade; so the 330 vessels of 808,000 tons in the regular line service are only, as I have said, one-eighth of the entire fleet of coastwise vessels, including tramp steamers and sailing vessels, which are very small affairs as compared to the 330 vessels that are described as being engaged in the regular line service. But however that may be, the Senator is contending against the principle of exempting any of them on the ground that it is a subsidy; and, of course, it makes very little difference whether the number is large or small from the Senator's point of view.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to the fact that the rates made for ocean traffic are constantly changing.

Mr. GORE. That is true.

Mr. WEEKS. It is impossible to say that the rate to-day will obtain to-morrow. They are intensely competitive, not only as applied to foreign traffic but coastwise traffic. There are in every port of the United States tramp steamers at all times ready to take freight to any point at a competitive rate. I think if the Senator will examine the statistics, he will find that the coastwise shipping of the United States as a whole is not a highly remunerative industry under the conditions which obtain.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I suggested that competitive conditions had more or less influence upon foreign rates, but that those conditions did not entirely account for this wide and inexcusable disparity of rates.

I may say before passing that the Senator from New York seems to discuss the number of vessels with a great deal more alacrity than he does those comparative freight rates. I will add here that every man knows that the vessels, the forbidden vessels now owned by railroads, will soon pass into other hands when this canal is opend up to commerce. The temptations, the advantages, and the inducements will be so great that the railroads will be obliged to sell them. These will recruit the number of vessels which can avail themselves of this great highway even at the rate of 3 cents a hundred po nds, which is the toll proposed by the President on foreign vessels.

Mr. President, the opponents of the pending measure reached the very summit of their indignation, patriotism, and defiance when they hurled this gauge at our feet: Have we not expended $400,000,000, they say, to construct this canal, and can we not then exempt our own vessels from the payment of tolls?

As a matter of course, the Government of the United States will not pay tolls upon the vessels belonging to the Government. But, Mr. President, it is true that we have taxed the American people $400,000,000 to construct this canal. Shall we now tax the American people millions of dollars every year in order to maintain the canal for the use and enjoyment of a legalized monopoly? Is it not enough to tax the people $400,000,000 to construct this great highway? Can not the beneficiaries afford to pay for maintenance and operation. Shipowners and Senators who complain that the American people ought to be taxed to maintain this great highway after having been taxed $400,000,000 to construct it are a good deal like the woman who borrowed her neighbor's bonnet and then complained because it did not suit her complexion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, I assume, is of opinion that even if the coastwise ships pay tolls there will be a deficit in the operation of the canal.

Mr. GORE. That may be true for a time. I say "true," but I do not wish to express an opinion. I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is estimated, as I remember it, that there will be a deficit something like $12,000,000 annually. If we admit all nations to the free use of that canal on the same terms as the country that built it at an expenditure of $400,000,000, does not the Senator think that those other nations ought to help pay that deficit in some way?

Mr. GORE. I think no one has suggested the remission of the tolls to ships belonging to other nations or to citizens and subjects of other countries. I certainly have made no suggestion of that kind.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; the Senator did not. I think the Senator did not, perhaps, catch my interrogatory accurately. I repeat that if after spending $400,000,000 on that great waterway we open it to the nations of the world on terms of absolute equality with ourselves, and there is a large deficit, does the Senator think that the nation that built the canal out of taxes collected from the people ought to be called upon to make good that entire deficit, while the other nations, enjoying the privileges and benefits of the canal, pay nothing?

Mr. GORE. It may be true that those in authority in 1900 and 1901 drove a bad bargain when they negotiated and ratified the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I do not undertake to pronounce judgment upon that point at this time. The question now is not whether the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was wise or whether it was the best possible treaty. My only contention is that it is the treaty, and it ought to be observed both in letter and in spirit. I doubt not that when the canal becomes a going concern the tolls will equal the cost of maintenance, operation, and interest charges. I hope the receipts may ultimately amortize the debt and return to the Treasury the $400,000,000, that can be applied to other useful and beneficent improvements.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I read the other day that there had been slight earthquake shocks felt on the Canal Zone, which is in the earthquake zone. Suppose the Panama Canal was destroyed by an earthquake, I apprehend the Government of the United States would be called upon to rebuild it, would it not?

Mr. GORE. I assume so.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is reasonable to suppose.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; I think no other assumption is possible. We could hardly consent to take up a collection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet we give all other nations equal rights with us in the canal, on which we have spent $400,000,000, and if the canal should be destroyed we would be called upon to expend $400,000,000 more to rebuild it, and then we would give all other nations equal rights with ourselves in its use. That is the most extraordinary specimen of eleemosynary legislation that I ever heard of.

Mr. GORE. That promise is set down in the bond, and we have no discretion now to treat it lightly.

It was some years ago when the decision was made against a sea-level canal. I entertained apprehension at that time that some extraordinary catastrophe, such as suggested by the Senator, might one day dismantle the canal and necessitate its reconstruction.

Congress recently appropriated $35,000,000 to construct a railroad in Alaska. Do Senators on the other side think that this railway, constructed at public expense, should be open to all American railroad companies free of tolls? Is there any reason which would justify the passage of a ship through the canal without charge that would not justify the passage of a locomotive and train over this railroad without charge?

Mr. President, is the Democratic Party bound by its platform to grant this subsidy to our coastwise vessels? It is true that the Baltimore platform contained a plank declaring that coastwise vessels shall be allowed to pass through the canal without the payment of tolls. The promise is explicit. The promise is unequivocal. The promise is not shrouded with mist and fog. The promise is as luminous as a desert sun at noontide. Indeed, sir, the promise is as clear and as unmistakable as the language of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. President, we did make the promise. Shall we now break the promise? That is the point. I have been among those who have attached the greatest weight, and I may say the greatest sanctity, to platform pledges. I regard a platform as a covenant between the party making it and the people approving it. Yet I have never gone so far as some. I have never hedged a convention about with any sort of divinity. The doctrine that a convention can do no wrong is as dangerous as is the doctrine that a king can do no wrong. This instance demonstrates the danger of such a dogma.

Mr. President, I am impelled by reasons I believe to be just and justifiable not to keep the pledge. I assume the responsibility; I accept the consequences; yet those who are disposed to do so can plead extenuating circumstances in their behalf. The platform contained a pledge that coastwise vessels should be allowed to make the transit through the canal untaxed. Democratic Senators who vote against repeal undoubtedly have in that plank a plea that will be accepted in the court of public opinion. But, Mr. President, Democrats who vote for repeal, Democrats who vote against the continuance of this subsidy, will find another plank in this platform which sustains and which justifies their course of conduct. The Democratic platform contains a clear-cut and explicit declaration against the granting of ship subsidies. That is the ancient, the accepted, the immemorial faith of Democracy. The Democratic platform of 1904 fulminated a denunciation against ship subsidies; the Democratic platform of 1900 announced the faith of the fathers, a declaration against the granting of bounties and subsidies to American shipping. That, sir, is the traditional doctrine of the Democratic Party, and upon that doctrine stand those Senators who cast their vote for the pending bill.

Mr. President, there have always been two schools of thought in the United States touching protective duties, touching the granting of favors, bounties, subsidies, and privileges. The Republican Party has uniformly maintained that principle. The Democratic Party has uniformly stood out in favor of the principle of justice and equality and against the policy of privileges and of subsidies. That the heart of Democracy is still true to the faith is abundantly proven to-day. The vote in the other House in favor of repeal, the vote in the other House against this subsidy, was at the ratio of 4 to 1 amongst the Democrats. The heart of Democracy is still true to the principles of justice. The vote in this Chamber, I doubt not, amongst the Democrats, will be in the ratio of 4 to 1. The heart of Democracy still beats in sympathy with the unprivileged masses in an unequal contest with the privileged classes. This fact is proven by the circumstance that 713 delegates to the Baltimore convention have signified their support of the pending bill, and only 126 of those delegates have signified their opposition to the pending bill. This ratio is 5 to 1. Counting all who were silent as adverse, the vote of the delegates would be in the ratio of 2 to 1 in behalf of the traditional principles of the Democratic faith. I base these statements on a poll of the delegates which I have recently made. This, I say, proves their continued devotion to these accepted and recognized standards of justice and equality.

Democrats who desire to do so can plead the doctrine of ultra vires that the convention exceeded its powers. Could a Republican convention by declaring in favor of free trade and tariff for revenue only bind its membership to that principle? Would such a declaration bind the conscience and the conduct of lifelong Republicans who were devoted to the policy of protection? Sir, I mean no disrespect, but could a conference of the Methodist Church, could a convention of the Baptist or Christian Church, could a council of the Catholic Church renounce and adjure the Apostles' Creed and commit its membership to the philosophy of negation? Would such an attempt be binding either upon the conscience or the conduct of a Christian congregation? Could a Democratic convention by declaring in favor of a protective tariff bind its membership to that Republican fallacy? Can you thus convert the apostles of equal justice into the champions of special favors?

Mr. President, to the Democracy the upas tree of privilege is the tree of death, not the tree of life. Its deadly fruit is the forbidden fruit. I must say that I marveled when I discovered that this cuckoo egg of subsidy was in the Democratic nest of equality. I must beware when I see this Republican horse freighted with destruction introduced into the citadel of Democracy.

Mr. President, there is still another reason justifying Democratic Senators in withholding their support from this plank of the Baltimore platform. Whatever may be said of the platform pledge, of its solemnity, and of its binding effect upon individual Democrats, in so far as the British Government is concerned, it was an ex parte proceeding.

The Government of the United States is bidden, it is bound by solemn treaty obligations, to equal treatment and to equal tolls as among all the nations of the earth in respect to the Panama Canal. Mr. President, let it be remembered here that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was entered into upon the initiative of the United States, and not upon that of Great Britain. In 1850 Great Britain maintained a protectorate over the strip of territory including the mouth of the San Juan River in Nicaragua. That point was regarded as indispensable to the construction of an interoceanic canal. The seizure of Tiger Island that year precipitated a crisis in the international relations between the United States and the Government of Great Britain. Out of that crisis came the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It composed all the differences then existing between the two Governments.

It can not be denied that article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty embodies the principle of neutrality and the principle of equality. It provides that the canal shall be open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms. No one will deny that if the canal had been constructed under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it would have been impossible for the United States to have discriminated in favor of its coastwise shipping.

It must also be remembered that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was entered into not upon the initiative of Great Britain, but upon the motion of the United States. During the course of that correspondence Lord Lansdowne declared that Great Britain had no desire to secure a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The principle of neutralization embodied in the eighth article of that treaty was imported into and made a part of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Now, Mr. President, what is the controverted language in the Hay-Pauncefote convention? It is this:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Mr. President, what is the historic background in accordance with which that language must be interpreted? A long and illustrious line of Secretaries of State, from Henry Clay to John Hay, have given expression to the traditional policy of this Government. As far back as 1825 Henry Clay, then Secretary of State, declared that the benefits of a trans-Isthmian canal "ought not be exclusively appropriated to any one nation."

Secretary of State Clayton, who assisted in the negotiation of the treaty bearing his name, entertained the view that the canal should be as open as the high seas.

President Taylor, Chief Executive when the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was negotiated, declared in a message to Congress that the canal "ought to be dedicated to the common use of mankind."

That, sir, was before the spirit of monopoly was so rampant in this Republic.

Mr. Cleveland declared that the proposed canal had been consecrated to the common use of mankind.

John Hay subscribed to the principle of neutralization and equality.

Mr. President, the best review of our traditional policy of neutrality and equality is contained in the Republican campaign book for the year 1900. It reviews the language of these distinguished statesmen, these distinguished Secretaries of State; it demonstrates why the principle of equality could not have been abrogated in the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, then pending before the Senate. It is elaborate; it is comprehensive; it is illuminating; it characterizes the position of the Democratic Party at that time as born either of ignorance or of willful disregard for our solemn contractual relations. In regard to the principle of neutralization it uses this powerful language:

This has been the uniform and unchanging policy of the Government of the United States from the very beginning. It has never had any other thought or purpose than to open this interoceanic waterway to the use of all nations upon equal terms.

"To the use of all nations upon equal terms." The Democratic platform in 1900 characterized the Hay-Pauncefote treaty then pending as "a surrender of American rights and interests, not to be tolerated by the American people," but it did not impinge, it did not challenge the principle of neutralization or equality. The Democratic campaign book of 1900 used this clear-cut and unmistakable language:

No one can deny that an interoceanic canal should be open to all commerce on equal terms. It is beneath the dignity of the United States to discuss it with any other power in any other phase.

Nobody dreamed at that time that the United States had the power to discriminate when the treaty said there should be no discrimination.

But, Mr. President, what did the plenipotentiaries of the United States, what did the representatives of the United States in this negotiation think that they said, what did they think that they meant by the use of the language in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Their testimony is uniform and unvarying. Joseph Choate was at that time ambassador to the Court of St. James. He says that—

The language of the treaty excludes the possibility—

Excludes the possibility, mark that—of any discrimination in favor of any American vessel, excepting ships of war in time of war.

Mr. President, that is tolerably clear; we at least understand what he was driving at; we understand what he thought he was saying and what he thought he meant. Mr. Henry White was for a time during the negotiations American chargé d'affaires. What does Mr. White say? He says that it was his understanding, and, as he thinks, the understanding of Lord Lansdowne, Lord Salisbury, and Lord Pauncefote, from the beginning to the end of the negotiations, that there was to be no discrimination in favor of American vessels, not even coastwise vessels. That is what Mr. White thought he said during those negotiations; that is what he thought he meant, before Senators came to enlighten him as to his real intents and purposes.

What did John Hay, then Secretary of State and a fairly good master of correct English, imagine that he was saying and meaning when he gave consent to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Mr. Hay was one of our most illustrious Secretaries of State and received his baptism in politics as confidential secretary to Abraham Lincoln, the greatest President between Jackson and Wilson. I shall quote Mr. Hay's exact language a little further on. Let me now analyze the mysterious, the obscure, the mystifying verbiage in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. We begin with the first clause in the mooted article:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules.

Mr. President, from the very threshold we are plunged into impenetrable darkness. "All nations." What can that phrase possibly mean? "All" is an obscure word. It is vague, indefinite, uncertain. It is as indefinite as space itself. Where does it end? If we only know that "all" meant "all," we should be freed from perplexity, but who will be so bold as to suggest in this presence that "all" means "all"?

There was one so audacious as to attribute to the word that definition. That was Secretary John Hay. He undertook to define it. He said, "'All' means 'all.'" He said, "The treaty was not so long that we could not have said 'all other nations' if that had been the meaning." He then adds, with presumption, "'All nations' means 'all nations.'" But who would undertake to balance the authority of John Hay, whose name this treaty bears, with the advocates of subsidy and monopoly who have now come to judgment? These great linguists and diplomatists could have put all doubt to death by simply saying "all nations and then some."

But we proceed, amid the fog and the obscurity, to the second clause:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations—on terms of entire equality.

How?

Here our bewilderment becomes more wildering—"on terms of entire equality." If we only knew that "entire" meant "entire," our feet would rest upon an unriven rock. But, sir, who will venture such an interpretation? "On terms of entire equality." Senators say that "entire" does not mean "entire"; and who will challenge such high authority?

We proceed. Doubts peep over doubts and clouds on clouds arise.

The third clause:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality—

Why?

So that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects.

Here is confusion worse confounded. Here we heap shade upon shadow. Cimmerian darkness, contrasted with this Delphian oracle, were as sunlight unto moonlight, nay, as noontide unto midnight.

So that there shall be no discrimination.

Now, they could have made it stronger than that if they had seen fit. The question immediately springs into every Senator's mind, "Does 'no discrimination' mean 'no discrimination'?" If it does, there the controversy may rest; but I am not commissioned to say that "no discrimination" means "no discrimination."

Mr. President, we must let some Daniel come to judgment; some one who can interpret the dream of the King without having heard the King's dream. Mark this bewildering confusion: "All nations," "entire equality," "no discrimination."

About, about in reel and rout,
These doubtful phrases thread the mazes of the misty dance.

From this time forth let Talleyrand's paradox be taken as a truism, that the object of language is to conceal thought.

We close our eyes and call it night;
We grope and fall in seas of light.

There are two historic incidents that shed much light upon this question and illuminate the pathway of our duty. Senator Bard, of California, offered an amendment to the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty which reserved, in express terms, the authority to exempt from the payment of tolls our coastwise vessels. That amendment was rejected by an overwhelming majority. Great Britain had a right to understand that action on the part of the Senate as a reaffirmation of our traditional policy in favor of equality of treatment and in favor of equality of tolls. Senators say, however, that the Bard amendment was rejected because it was unnecessary. Senators say that the Bard amendment, reserving the express authority to exempt from tolls, was rejected because the power was involved and implied in the terms of the treaty itself.

Sir, that was a fastidious parsimony of words which ought to warn all statesmen of the future to be exact, even at the peril of being extravagant.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, does the Senator desire to conclude this evening?

Mr. GORE. Yes. It will not take me very long.

Great Britain rejected the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The prizes which it held out were not so alluring as to secure her ratification nolens volens. Can any Senator imagine that Great Britain would have ratified the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty if it had contained the Bard amendment? Does any Senator imagine that Great Britain would have ratified this treaty if she had suspected that the United States intended to depart from its traditional policy in favor of equal treatment and equal tolls?

There is another historic incident which shoots a ray of light into the blackness. In 1884 the United States negotiated a treaty with the Republic of Nicaragua. The treaty was never ratified, yet it is significant. It is known as the Frelinghuysen-Zevalla treaty. Under the terms of that treaty Nicaragua conceded to the United States the right and authority to construct a canal across her territory and to own the canal. It was to be operated under a board of management appointed by the two contracting Governments.

Mr. President, in article 14 of this treaty I find the following salient and significant language, which Senators will mark:

The tolls hereinbefore provided shall be equal as to vessels of the parties hereto and of all nations, except that vessels entirely owned and commanded by citizens of either one of the parties to this convention and engaged in its coasting trade may be favored.

This secured equality of tolls in all international commerce between the United States, Nicaragua, and all other nations, but as to our coastwise trade we expressly reserved the power to exempt those vessels from the payment of tolls. We had a treaty subsisting many years with Great Britain assuring neutrality and equality. When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated Great Britain had before her eyes this rejected treaty between the United States and Nicaragua. Great Britain had a right to believe that if the United States intended to renounce the principle of equal treatment the United States would have the candor and would have the courage to say so, as they did say in the Frelinghuysen-Zevalla treaty.

As if to anticipate this very discussion, as if they caught glimpses of coming events, the British negotiators suggested this article in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Our subsequent acquisition of the Panama Canal Zone does not relieve us from our solemn covenant to maintain entire equality of treatment to all nations observing the stipulated rules.

Mr. President, Great Britain, especially in the esteem of some Senators here, enjoys the reputation of being a pretty shrewd bargainer. What did Great Britain get under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? What did she get in return for the concessions made by the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty? All this labored language, all this iteration and reiteration of assurances as to equality and discrimintion comes to this, that Great Britain was simply insisting that the treaty should be so written that she never could receive at the hands of the United States any favor, any advantage, any consideration, any return for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

It would have been infinitely better for Great Britain had she merely insisted upon the insertion of the "favored-nation" clause, a proviso that the vessels of Great Britain should be as favorably treated as the vessels of the most-favored nation. That would have given her all the equality, all the guaranties against discrimination, which she enjoys under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it would not have foreclosed the possibility of her receiving some favor in the future for her generosity in the abrogation of that convention. It would have left at least the opportunity for the United States to bear witness to their appreciation of Great Britain's magnanimous action in revoking the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the abandonment of her demand for equal treatment.

Mr. President, if this be true, Great Britain gave one other indication either of treachery or of stupidity that can hardly be imputed to that ancient and enlightened Government. Great Britain agreed to renounce the guaranties of equality and subjected her own commerce to serious discrimination, and abandoned the coastwise trade of the Dominion of Canada to an impossible competition against the coastwise trade of the United States.

Let me cite one or two instances. Let us say that a vessel receives at Liverpool a cargo of dry goods and structural steel, bound for some port in Japan. It passes through the Panama Canal and pays, let us say, $15,000 toll. It is desired in New York to ship dry goods and structural steel to the same port in Japan in competition with the English goods. A vessel engaged in our coastwise trade receives the cargo at New York, passes through the canal toll free, touches at San Diego, Cal., and there the cargo is transshipped to another vessel, owned perhaps by the same concern, and is delivered at its destined port in Japan without having paid tribute for passing through the canal. That would be coastwise trade from New York to San Diego; and can we provide guaranties that such cargoes shall never be shipped beyond the seas?

Take another instance. A Canadian ship clears at Halifax, bound for San Francisco. It pays, let us say, $10,000 toll in transit through the canal. Another ship, bound to the same point, laden with a similar cargo, clears at New York, bound for San Francisco. It passes through the canal tax free. Is not that intolerable competition?

Reverse the voyage. A Canadian ship takes on a cargo of grain and of lumber at Vancouver, makes a passage through the canal, paying $10,000 in tolls, and delivers its cargo at New York. An American vessel receives grain and lumber at Port Townsend or Seattle, Wash., passes through the canal without the payment of tolls, and delivers its cargo in New York in competition with the Canadian vessel. What will be the first result of that?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does not the Senator think that there is another situation which is even more intolerable than what the Senator calls attention to? That is, that while we prevent American ships owned or controlled by railroads from entering the canal at all, we allow Canadian ships that are owned by railroads to pass through the Panama Canal?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think that raises a most interesting question, and a question that will insist upon consideration at some future time.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I am glad the Senator says that, because aside from the great questions involved in this debate, which has been most interesting and edifying to me, that feature of our legislation is manifestly unfair, and I feel sure the American people will not always stand for the proposition that we shall prohibit our own ships that are controlled or owned by railroads from entering the canal at all, and at the same time allow the fleets of the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railroads to pass through the canal without let or hindrance. Some remedy must be found for that.

Mr. GORE. It can hardly be denied that the Government sometimes insists upon increasing difficulties incident to transactions which are absolutely essential not only to commerce but to civilization.

Mr. President, what will be the first result of the situation which I have just described with respect to Vancouver and Seattle? The first result will be that wheat and lumber produced in British Columbia would be diverted from Vancouver and would be shipped by rail to Port Townsend or Seattle and then shipped by American coastwise vessels to our Atlantic seaboard cities. The second result would be that the Dominion of Canada would impose an export duty or a prohibition on the shipment of goods from Canada into the United States. Carlyle's observation that "Injustice begets injustice" is as true as truth.

We must not subject ourselves to the criticism or the suspicion that our principles change with our interest or vary with our situation. This is not the first controversy we have ever had concerning the definition of the phrase "equal treatment," as contained in an international treaty. The United States and Great Britain entered into a treaty in 1871 known as the treaty of Washington. Under the twenty-seventh article of that convention equal treatment was guaranteed to the citizens of the United States and to the inhabitants of Canada in regard to the canals in their respective territories connecting the waters of the Great Lakes. Canada passed a law imposing a toll of 20 cents per ton on all vessels passing through the Welland Canal. She provided, however, that vessels carrying cargoes as far east or farther east than Montreal should be entitled to a rebate of 18 cents per ton. President Cleveland protested that this refund or subsidy violated the guaranty of equal treatment to the citizens of the United States. President Harrison reiterated this protest. Congress enacted a law authorizing the imposition of retaliatory tolls. Canada receded from her position. Her canals are free and open to citizens of the United States upon equal terms with her own inhabitants. Does the reciprocal pledge of equal treatment bind the other nation alone, and is it to our Government fragile as a rope of sand? It is no special credit, either to an individual or to a nation, to observe a contract when it is highly advantageous to do so. That imposes no strain either upon the private or the public conscience. The easiest morals could assume that virtue. Good faith at 5 per cent were a delightful duty. It is they who keep the faith when the advantage is doubtful or adverse that are entitled to the confidence and admiration of mankind.

Mr. President, this question arises now, Which is paramount, the obligation of a platform promise or the obligation of a treaty? Surely this question is not open to controversy. Under the Constitution of the United States the Constitution itself and the laws and treaties made in pursuance thereof are the supreme law of the land. This treaty is the supreme law of the land. The Baltimore platform, strange as it may seem, is not in every particular the supreme law of the land. No one can hesitate as to the path of duty when a platform comes into collision with a treaty obligation.

Let me digress for one moment at this juncture. I have been much amused at the bombastic bravado manifested by certain Senators when engaged in the luxurious pastime of baiting the British lion. I shall do no more than allude to that splendid and entertaining pantomime, but I remember that Tam O'Shanter's wife had to nurse her wrath to keep it warm. I think that these irate Senators must have placed their hereditary wrath in cold storage this century past in order that it might flame out into incandescent fury on this occasion. I remember that the heroism of Sir John Falstaff was in direct proportion to the square of the distance between himself and his embattled enemies.

Mr. President, if I may be pardoned for so saying, I am Irish in lineage, I am Irish in sympathy, and, sir, if you please, I am Irish in my antipathies. I hope to see the hopes of Ireland gratified in the realization of home rule. While I may have no right to express such an opinion, the greatest disaster that could befall Ireland would be the fall of the present British ministry.

Mr. President, reverting to the obligations of our treaty, the United States can not afford to sacrifice the high and justified reputation it has always borne for faithful, for scrupulous observance of each and every such obligation. One Senator took occasion the other day to defend the United States against the supposed imputation that they had not been faithful to their treaty pledges. Sir, the United States needs no such defense. Their record and their reputation are not only above challenge, they are above suspicion. We can not afford to sacrifice our fair fame for fair dealing by the repudiation of a solemn, ratified obligation.

Mr. President, good faith is to a nation what honor is to a man and what chastity is to a woman. It is the one virtue without which all other virtues are unavailing.

Mr. President, during the course of this discussion it has been said, regretfully by some and rejoicefully, if I may so say, by others, that the pending bill is the rock upon which the Democracy must split. While I am no mariner, I anticipate no such disaster. Senators who feel bound by the platform and oppose the pending measure have ample justification, and they will receive no criticism at the hands of their associates here or at the hands of their constituencies at home. Senators who feel bound by treaty obligations to disregard the Baltimore platform have a justification that will exempt them from criticism by their Democratic colleagues here and their constituencies at home.

Mr. President, it has been said that the President of the United States has reversed his views touching the remission of tolls. He has been impeached for inconsistency. It sometimes requires more courage to be right than to be consistent. I have no doubt that the present Chief Magistrate of this Republic would rather be right than be consistent.

The President is not one to change his matured convictions for light and transient causes. When he recanted his former utterances and renounced his former views we must assume that he was impelled by reasons not only of the most patriotic but of the most overpowering character. Under our Constitution he is peculiarly charged with the direction of our international relations. He possesses information upon the subject more intimate than that to which any Senator can pretend. For my part, when I receive such solemn assurances at his hands as were contained in his message in relation to the pending bill I am disposed to follow his leadership.

Mr. President, the present Democratic administration is dedicated to the rights of man. I may say it is consecrated to the rights of man. It came into power as a revolt against privilege and monopoly, as a revolt against ancient abuses. The present administration came into power pledged to a revision of the tariff. It has kept the faith. The present administration came into power pledged to a revision of our banking and currency system. The party has kept the faith. It came into power pledged to dismantle existing monopoly and to emancipate the American masses from the thraldom and from the tyranny of the trusts. The party will keep the faith. The Democracy is entitled to receive and so long as it is entitled it will continue not merely the passing plaudits but the deep and enduring approbation of the enlightened citizenship of this Republic.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I have been asked to move a short executive session, which I will do presently. I think I will move, if it is in order now, that at the conclusion of the executive session the Senate will take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that at the conclusion of the executive session the Senate will take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I assume that that is with the understanding that we will continue the session from 8 o'clock until 10 o'clock, and then take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11. Is that correct?

Mr. KERN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. JAMES. It might be that some Senator would be in the midst of a speech at 10 and would conclude in 30 minutes. It is not absolutely necessary that we shall agree to adjourn at 10 o'clock.

Mr. GALLINGER. That, I think, will take care of itself.

Mr. KERN. That will take care of itself.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have not pressed my suggestion as to any limitation, but——

Mr. KERN. We will have no trouble about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana that the Senate take a recess after the executive session until 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply want to make the statement that if the Senate is to remain here and dispose of the program which is now before us any attempt to hasten progress by holding the Senate in session all day long and then forcing a night session will not result, in my opinion, in the advancement by a single hour of the program which we understand we are expected to go through. The health of Senators will be impaired. The patience and ability of Senators to work will be impaired. While I am willing to stay here and am physically able to stay here as long as any other Senator on either side, I see no reason for undertaking at 15 minutes past 6 to go into executive session and then to hold a night session and to proceed along that line.

If there was a filibuster, or if there was a consumption of time here for the mere purpose of consuming time, a different question would be presented. There has not been the appearance of a filibuster. There has not been the slightest evidence of an attempt to prolong this discussion for the sake of prolonging it. We happened to have a cool day to-day, but let us have a few days of the temperature and atmospheric conditions of yesterday and, with such a forced program, we will have some sick men, and we may have some dead men. As far as I am concerned, I do not intend to be one of those sick men or one of the dead men, because I am fortunately in an excellent condition of health; but there are men in this Chamber who are entitled, I think, to a reasonable recess and who, if they come here at 11 o'clock in the morning and stay until 6 o'clock and work, have gone the limit of reasonable physical endurance.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I desire to supplement what the Senator from Missouri has just said. The trust bills, so called, have come over from the House. They have been referred to committees. The committees will be considering those bills for weeks. There is not the slightest occasion——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Is the motion debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to take a recess is not debatable under the rule.

Mr. THOMAS and others. Question!

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to say that the Senator will make no progress by undertaking to force things here, if that is the purpose?

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BRISTOW. I simply wanted to offer a few suggestions, and if Senators think they can take me off my feet in this way and make progress to-night they will find they can not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to the Senator making the suggestion he rose to make; but, clearly, I think the motion is not debatable. I am glad to hear the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. BRISTOW. The remarks are being made by unanimous consent, and I am speaking only by unanimous consent. I was making a suggestion that I think is in the interest of public business and in the interest of the time of the Senate. We want to complete the work. There is no use undertaking to interfere with the program. I am willing to stay here until October and help carry it out, and it will take until October to do it; but it is not common sense to hold sessions of 10 and 11 hours in the middle of summer in order to accomplish the work that is laid out for this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina makes the point of order that the motion is not debatable, and the Chair sustains it The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. REED. Let it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that after an executive session the Senate will take a recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m. on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). The Senate resumes consideration of the unfinished business, which is House bill 14385.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, if we are to have a night session, we certainly ought to have a quorum, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Jones	Overman	Sutherland
Bryan	Kenyon	Page	Swanson
Burleigh	Kern	Perkins	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lea, Tenn.	Pittman	Thornton
Clapp	McCumber	Sheppard	Townsend

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. LANE and Mr. WEST answered to their names when called.

Mr. ASHURST entered the Chamber, and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names—not a quorum.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. STEPHENSON entered the Chamber, and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the order just entered be vacated.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have heretofore, at the opening of this discussion, spoken at considerable length on practically every principal feature of the subject, and I could have no excuse whatever for reiterating any part of what I then said. If the vote to-day, or whenever we shall arrive at a vote, were to settle the entire question, I certainly would not be heard to continue any further remarks upon the subject. While the remarks I am about to make will be, I think, of advantage for future reference when this subject may be before the Senate again, I can scarcely hope that they will have any present effect.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa the other day expressed great surprise that there were Senators so un-American as to be willing in this tolls controversy to grant more than Great Britain had asked. Whether it is un-American depends entirely upon what we regard as the true American attitude. If the American policy is to avoid our agreements whenever they conflict with our interest, and, above all, never to go beyond the demand of the other party in the fulfillment of our obligations, then I am ready to concede that our position is un-American. But if, on the other hand, the true American attitude is to meet our national obligations without quibble and proceed to carry out our contracts in accordance with the clear and known understanding of the parties and without waiting for any demand whatever, partial or complete, then, Mr. President, I believe that it is we who are representing the true American attitude.

If I have entered into a contract with the Senator from Iowa and another contract of like tenor with the Senator from New Hampshire, in which, for a valuable consideration, I have agreed to follow a certain course of conduct in reference to both of them and all other parties, I am not going to wait for any demand from either of them to comply with that contract. I am going to proceed to make my promise good.

So in this case, Mr. President, I have never given the British protest any particular consideration. I have only considered the simple question, What did the United States agree to do? And there being no question on earth as to not only what we did agree to do but also as to what we said we understood our words to mean, I want my Government to do just what I, as an individual citizen, would do under just those conditions. I took that position before any protest was ever made by the British Government, and I shall continue to take that position until the good name of my country is reestablished among the nations of the earth and maintained in the minds of all its people who understand its obligations and who would jealously guard its national word.

I, too, Mr. President, have been greatly surprised to find that Senators seem to adopt one standard of individual ethics and an entirely different standard of national ethics—one standard for the citizen and another for the Nation.

There is not a Senator in this body who would attempt to give his personal contract a construction which would differ from his previous statement to the other party as to what he had intended and both intended that the contract should mean. I go further and say there is no Senator here who would insist on a construction of his personal contract out of harmony with what he believed the other party in good faith understood it to mean, even though he felt he had a perfect moral right to give it a different construction.

And yet, Mr. President, I find Senators blinding their eyes not only to the natural, usual, obvious meaning of words in an international agreement, shutting them not only to the previous history of the transaction, which shows that the words were intended to have their natural meaning and not a restricted use, but also closing them to the clear and unqualified declaration of every party who had to do with the negotiations and drafting of the treaty as to what they all meant and intended to mean, and then proceeding with most studious effort and with all the technicalities which imagination can suggest to avoid the purposes and understanding of the negotiators of that contract. I do not question the integrity of Senators, but I confess I can not fathom their mental operations.

Mr. President, the passage of this bill will not settle this question. I shall not prophesy that it will not be settled until it is settled right, for things in this world are not always settled that way, but that the real settlement is postponed to the future.

For the use of those who may desire some ready references and a very concise history of this matter, I shall proceed to place in the permanent RECORD some of the most salient points bearing on this matter.

Mr. President, nations speak to each other and to the world at large through executive declarations, legislative resolutions, and diplomatic utterances. By those declarations, resolutions, and utterances are they judged, and through them are their treaties and contracts construed. In the simplicity and directness of these modes of communication we recognize their courage and candor; in the lack of that simplicity and directness we recognize their shiftiness and unworthiness.

Mr. President, we are about to vote whether or not our country shall retain its place in the former class and whether our previous reputation for absolute candor in our international diplomacy is to be maintained by the Senate of the United States.

Before that vote is taken I wish to place the two Nations—the United States and Great Britain—face to face, and, refraining from any comment myself, let this Senate and the country read what they said to the world and to each other for a century preceding the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, concerning equality of treatment of all vessels of the world, including our own, in the use of any canal that might be constructed across the Isthmus of Panama. I shall reproduce only, and very briefly, those sentences bearing directly upon that question.

ON THE GENERAL QUESTION OF FREE NAVIGATION OF RIVERS AND CANALS LEADING TO THE SEA.

UNITED STATES TO FRANCE AND SPAIN. August 6, 1779. (Instructing John Jay, our minister, to conclude a treaty with France and Spain:)

"Nevertheless you shall insert on the part of your State a proper article or articles for obtaining free navigation of the Mississippi River."

UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO EACH OTHER. September 3, 1783. (Treaty with Great Britain:)

"The navigation of the River Mississippi from its source to its mouth shall forever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. 1792. (Mr. Jefferson, then Secretary of State. Report to Congress:)

"When their rivers enter the limits of another society, if the right of the upper inhabitants to descend the stream is in any case obstructed, it is an act of force by a stronger society against a weaker, condemned by the judgment of mankind."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. March 2, 1803. (Letter of President Jefferson to Livingston and Monroe, our representatives in France:)

"The United States have a just claim to the use of the rivers which pass from their territory through the Floridas. They found their claims on like principles with those which supported their claims for the use of the Mississippi."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. 1823. (President Monroe in negotiation with Great Britain for equal navigation of St. Lawrence:)

The right to navigate the St. Lawrence River is one which may be established upon the "general principle of the law of nature."

UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO EACH OTHER. March 17, 1816. (Reciprocal treaty:)

The right of reciprocal navigation of the St. Lawrence by both nations on terms of equality established.

UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO EACH OTHER. 1854. (Reciprocal treaty:)

"It is agreed that the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall have the right to navigate the River St. Lawrence and the canals in Canada used as the means of communicating between the Great Lakes and the Atlantic Ocean with their vessels, boats, and crafts, as fully and freely as the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, subject only to the same tolls and other assessments as now are or may hereafter be exacted of Her Majesty's said subjects.

* * * * * * *

It is further agreed that British subjects shall have the right freely to navigate Lake Michigan with their vessels, boats, and crafts so long as the privilege of navigating the River St. Lawrence, secured to American citizens by the above clause of the present article, shall continue; and the Government of the United States further engages to urge upon the State governments to secure to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty the use of the several State canals on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States."

UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO EACH OTHER. 1871. (Reciprocal treaty relating to the canals of both countries:)

"The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engage to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion."

"The subjects of Her Britannic Majesty shall enjoy the use of the St. Clair Flats Canal on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States."

DECLARATIONS IN RESPECT TO ANY CANAL WHICH MIGHT BE CONSTRUCTED ACROSS THE ISTHMUS.

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. 1826. (Instructions prepared by Henry Clay, Secretary of State under President John Quincy Adams, referring to the construction of the canal:)

"If the work should ever be executed so as to admit of the passage of sea vessels from ocean to ocean, the benefits of it ought not to be exclusively appropriated to any one nation, but should be extended to all parts of the globe upon the payment of a just compensation or reasonable tolls."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. March 3, 1835. (Congressional resolution:)

"Resolved, That the President be requested to consider the expediency of opening negotiations with the Governments of other nations for the purpose of effectually protecting by suitable treaty stipulations with them such companies as may undertake the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus, and securing for them by such stipulations the free and equal rights of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of reasonable tolls."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. March 2, 1839. (Report of committee of House of Representatives:)

"The policy is not less apparent which should prompt the United States to cooperate in this enterprise liberally and efficiently before other disposition may be awakened in the particular State within whose territory it may be ceded or other nations shall seek by negotiation to engross a commerce which is now and should ever continue to be open to all."

UNITED STATES AND NEW GRENADA TO THE WORLD. December 12, 1846. (Treaty:)

"The right of way or transit across the Isthmus upon any modes of communication shall be open and free to the two Governments on equal terms."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. 1846. (Message of President Polk submitting treaty with New Grenada:)

"The ultimate object (of the resolution of March 3, 1835) is to secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. September 25, 1849. (Our minister to France, duly instructed, communicating with Lord Palmerston, representative of Great Britain:)

"That the United States sought no exclusive privilege or preferential right of any kind in regard to the proposed communication, and their sincere wish, if it should be found practicable, was to see it dedicated to the common use of all nations on the most liberal terms and a footing of perfect equality."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. September 25, 1849. (American minister to Lord Palmerston, British representative:)

"That the United States would not, if they could, obtain any exclusive right or privilege in a great highway which naturally belonged to all mankind. That while they aimed at no exclusive privilege themselves, they would never consent to see so important a communication fall under the exclusive control of any commercial power."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. 1849. (Letter of Mr. Clayton, Secretary of State, to Mr. Lawrence, our representative in Great Britain, to be made known to the British Government:)

"If, however, the British Government shall reject these overtures on our part and shall refuse to cooperate with us in the generous and philanthropic scheme of rendering the interoceanic communication by way of the port and river of San Juan free to all nations upon the same terms, we shall deem ourselves justified in protecting our interests independent of her aid and despite her hostility."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. December 4, 1849. (Message of President Taylor to Congress:)

"The territory through which the canal may be opened ought to be freed from the claims of any foreign power. No such power should occupy a position that would enable it hereafter to exercise so controlling an influence over the commerce of the world or to obstruct a highway which ought to be dedicated to the use of mankind."

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO EACH OTHER AND TO THE WORLD. April 19, 1850. (Clayton-Bulwer treaty, article 8:)

"The United States and Great Britain, having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree."

Particular object to be accomplished:

"The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal."

General principle to be established:

"It is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable, and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State."

The foregoing clause was always thereafter referred to as the "general principle." And wherever "general principle" of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is used by the parties, this is the particular clause referred to.

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN AND TO THE WORLD. 1857. (Mr. Cass, Secretary of State, replying to Lord Napier, who had suggested a plan of joint protectorate:)

"In view of these interests and after having invited capital and enterprise from other countries to aid in the opening of these great highways of nations under pledge of free transit to all desiring it, it can not be permitted that these Governments [countries through which the canal might pass] should exercise over them arbitrary and unlimited control."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. 1862. (Note of Mr. Seward, Secretary of State under President Lincoln:)

"This Government has no interest in the matter different from that of any other maritime power. It is willing to interpose its aid in execution of its treaty and further equal benefit of all nations."

UNITED STATES TO NICARAGUA AND THE WORLD. 1867. (Treaty concerning the construction of a canal:)

"And no higher or other charges or tolls shall be imposed on the conveyance or transit of persons and property of citizens or subjects of the United States or of any other country across the said routes of communication than are or may be imposed on the persons and property of the citizens of Nicaragua."

UNITED STATES AND COLUMBIA TO EACH OTHER AND TO THE WORLD. 1868. (Treaty authorizing the United States to construct a canal not ratified by the Senate:)

"The Government of the United States of America shall establish a tariff of tolls and freights for the said canal on a basis of perfect equality for all nations whether in time of peace or war."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. (President Grant through Secretary Fish:)

"We shall be glad of any movement which shall result in the early decision of the question of the most practical route and the early commencement and speedy completion of an interoceanic communication which shall be guaranteed in its perpetual neutralization and dedication to the commerce of all nations without advantage to one over another of those who guarantee its assured neutrality. * * * The benefit of neutral waters at the ends thereof for all classes of vessels entitled to fly their respective flags with the cargoes on board on equal terms in every respect as between each other."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. June 24, 1881. (President Garfield, through Secretary Blaine, to our minister to England:)

"Nor in time of peace does the United States seek to have any exclusive privileges accorded to American ships, in respect to precedence or tolls, through any interoceanic canal any more than it has sought like privileges for American goods in transit over the Panama Railway under the exclusive control of an American corporation. * * * It would be our earnest desire and expectation to see the world's peaceful commerce enjoy the same just, liberal, and rational treatment."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. November 19, 1881. (President Garfield through Secretary Blaine:)

"This Government entertains no design in connection with this project for its advantage which is not also for the equal or greater advantage of the country to be directly and immediately affected; nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees, and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe, and equally in time of peace the harmless use of the canal shall be freely granted to the war vessels of other nations."

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. (Replying to the above letter through Lord Granville:)

"Such communication concerned not merely the United States or the American continent but, as was recognized by article 6 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the whole civilized world, and that she would not oppose or decline any discussion for the purpose of securing on a general international basis its universal and unrestricted use."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. (President Cleveland in his first annual message to Congress:)

"Whatever highway that may be constructed across the barrier dividing the two greatest maritime areas of the world, must be for the world's benefit—a truth for mankind."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. (Second administration of President Cleveland, through Secretary of State Olney:)

"That the interoceanic routes there specified should, under the sovereignty of the States traversed by them, be neutral and free to all nations alike. Under these circumstances, upon every principle which governs the relations to each other, either by nations or of individuals, the United States is completely estopped from denying that the treaty [Clayton-Bulwer treaty] is in full force and vigor."

UNITED STATES TO THE WORLD. December 5, 1898. (Message of President McKinley:)

"That the construction of a maritime highway is now more than ever indispensable to that intimate and ready intercommunication between our eastern and western seaboards demanded by the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands and the prospective expansion of our influence and commerce in the Pacific, and that our national policy now more imperatively than ever calls for its control by this Government, are propositions which I doubt not the Congress will duly appreciate and wisely act upon."

GENERAL UNDERSTANDING OF PEOPLE OF BOTH COUNTRIES AS TO A MODIFICATION OF THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. (Expressed in leading editorials on President McKinley's message:)

Editorial, London Spectator, December 10, 1898:

"The Times says most reasonably that if the freedom of the waterway were secured to ships of all nations, as in the case of the Suez Canal, we do not see what object we should have in standing strictly upon claims which originated when the circumstances were altogether different."

Editorial of Spectator, same date:

"All we want is that the canal shall be made, and when it is made it shall be open and available to our merchant ships and ships of war as freely as to those of the United States or other power."

"We would abrogate the treaty on the following terms:

"4. That the canal should be open at all times to all nations at peace with the United States.

"5. That the duties charged would be the same in the case of American and other vessels.

"If the United States were to agree, as we believe they would, to such terms as these, we would have no possible grounds for refusing to give up our rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. (As expressed in the press of the United States and congressional debates, to wit:)

"That the Government should be reimbursed for the money which should be expended by it in the construction of the canals, in tolls to be charged all vessels using the canal, as per estimates made upon the tonnage which would probably pass through it, and which estimates included the vessels of the United States as well as all other nations."

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. February 6, 1900. (Article in New York World analyzing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which had just been signed by Hay and Pauncefote:)

"The United States, however, is given the right to protect the canal, and may employ such measures as are needful for the safety of the canal and navigation. The canal, being the property of the United States and built with American capital, all the profits from the navigation of the canal will go to the United States, but there will be no discrimination in favor of the American vessels."

DIPLOMATIC COMMUNICATIONS BETWEEN THE TWO COUNTRIES RELATIVE TO THE PRESERVATION OF THE "GENERAL PRINCIPLE" OF THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY PROVIDING FOR EQUAL TREATMENT OF VESSELS OF BOTH NATIONS.

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. February 22, 1901. (Letter of Lansdowne to Pauncefote to present to Secretary Hay:)

"So far as Her Majesty's Government were concerned there was no desire to procure a modification of that convention [the Clayton-Bulwer treaty]. Some of its provisions had, however, for a long time past been regarded with disfavor by the Government of the United States, and in the President's message to Congress of December 18, 1898, it was suggested, with reference to a concession granted by the Government of Nicaragua, that some definite action by Congress was urgently required if the labors of the past were to be utilized and the linking of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by a practical waterway to be realized. * * * This passage in the message having excited comment, your excellency made inquiries of the Secretary of State in order to elicit some information as to the attitude of the President. In reply the views of the United States Government were very frankly and openly explained. You were also most emphatically assured that the President had no intention whatever of ignoring the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and that he would loyally observe treaty stipulations. But in view of the strong national feeling in favor of the construction of the Nicaraguan Canal and of the improbability of the work being accomplished by private enterprise, the United States Government were prepared to undertake it themselves upon obtaining the necessary powers from Congress. For that purpose, however, they must endeavor by friendly negotiations to obtain the consent of Great Britain to such a modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as would, without affecting the general principle therein declared, enable the great object in view to be accomplished for the benefit of the commerce of the world. * * * Her Majesty's Government agreed to this proposal, and the discussions which took place in consequence resulted in the draft of the convention which Mr. Hay handed to your excellency on the 11th of January, 1899."

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. February 22, 1901. (Lansdowne, through Lowther:)

"The proposal to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer convention is not, I think, inadmissible if it can be shown that sufficient provision is made in the new treaty for such portions of the convention as ought in the interests of this country to remain in force. This aspect of the case may be considered in connection with article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention which has already been quoted and article 8, referred to in the preamble of the new treaty. Thus, in view of the permanent character of the treaty to be concluded and of the 'general principle' reaffirmed thereby as a perpetual obligation, the high contracting parties should agree that no change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territory through which the canal is now to pass shall affect such 'general principle' or release the high contracting parties, or either of them, from their obligations under the treaty, and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization shall govern, so far as possible."

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. August 3, 1901. (Lansdowne to Secretary Hay, after receiving copy of draft of treaty:)

"I would therefore propose an additional article in the following terms on the acceptance of which His Majesty's Government would probably be prepared to withdraw their objections to the formal abrogation of the Calyton-Bulwer convention, to wit: 'In view of the permanent character of this treaty whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article (article 3) shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty or other change of circumstance shall affect the 'general principle' or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that I am seeking here to put in something without comment on my part, quoting only to get a line of conversations between the parties, and it would somewhat mar the purpose of this short essay if I were to go into a discussion. For that reason I hope the Senator will excuse me.

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. August 3, 1901. (Through the same parties:)

"On the other hand, I conclude that, with the above exception [which relates to fortifications], there is no intention to derogate from the principles of neutrality laid down by the rules. As to the first of these propositions, I am not prepared to deny that contingencies may arise when, not only from a national point of view, but on behalf of the commercial interests of the whole world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities."

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. (Through the same parties, August 3, 1901:)

"I suggest the renewal of one of the stipulations of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention by adding to rule 1 the words 'such conditions and charges shall be just and reasonable.'"

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. (Salisbury speaking through White to Hay:)

"I think that in due course of time we shall consent to the abrogation of such parts of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as stand in the way of your building the canal, subject, however, to one condition, on which we lay great stress, namely, that the ships of all nations shall use the canal or go through the canal on equal terms."

GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES. September 21, 1901. (Lansdowne speaking to Mr. Choate, and which Mr. Choate communicated to Secretary Hay:)

"But he [Lansdowne] said they could not give up article 3a altogether; that it was quite obvious that we might in the future acquire all the territory on both sides of the canal; that we might then claim that a treaty providing for the neutrality of a canal running through a neutral country could no longer apply to a canal running through American country only; and he again insisted, as Lord Lansdowne had insisted, that they must have something to satisfy Parliament and the British public that in giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they had retained and reasserted the 'general principle' of it; that the canal should be technically neutral and should be free to all nations on terms of equality, and especially that in the contingency supposed—of the territory on both sides of the canal becoming ours—the canal, its neutrality, its being free and open to all nations on equal terms, should not be thereby affected; that without securing this they could not justify the treaty either to Parliament or to the public; that the preamble that had already passed the Senate was not enough, although he recognized the full importance of the circumstance of its having passed.

UNITED STATES TO GREAT BRITAIN. (Answer of Secretary Hay in reference to the proposed article 3a:)

"The preamble of the draft treaty retained the declaration that the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not impaired. To reiterate this in still stronger language in a separate article and to give article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention what seems to be a wider function than it originally had, would, I fear, not meet with acceptance. If, however, it seems indispensable to his Majesty's Government that an article providing for the contingency of a change of sovereignty should be inserted, then it might be stated that 'it is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the countries traversed by the aforesaid canal shall affect the "general principle" of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.'"

UNITED STATES TO THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS. (Secretary Hay explaining the composing of differences between the two nations:)

"The proposed draft in the new treaty was submitted to Lord Lansdowne, and after mature deliberation he proposed, on the part of His Majesty's Government, only three substantial amendments. * * * Under this modified aspect of the relations of the two nations to the canal, he was not indisposed to consent to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if the 'general principle' of neutrality which was reaffirmed in the preamble in the new treaty, as well as of the former one, should be preserved and secured against any change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territories through which the canal is intended to pass, and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization should govern, as far as possible, all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus. He referred in this connection to articles 1 and 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He, therefore, proposed by way of an amendment the insertion of an additional article."

The article proposed is as follows:

"In view of the permanent character of this treaty whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communications across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty or other change of circumstances shall affect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"The President, however, was not only willing but desirous that the 'general principle' of neutralization referred to in the preamble of this treaty should be applicable to this canal now intended to be built, notwithstanding any change of sovereignty or of international relations of the territory through which it should pass. This 'general principle' of neutralization had always, in fact, been insisted upon by the United States, and he recognized the entire justice of the request of Great Britain that if she should now surrender the material interest which had been secured to her by the first article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which might result in the indefinite future, should the territory traversed by the canal undergo a change of sovereignty, this 'general principle' should not be thereby affected or impaired. These facts were communicated to His Majesty's Government, and as a substitute for the article proposed by Lord Lansdowne the following was proposed on the part of the United States:

"'It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the above-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.'"

UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN TO EACH OTHER AND TO THE WORLD. (Second Hay-Pauncefote treaty, adopted by the Senate December 16, 1901:)

PREAMBLE.

"The United States and Great Britain, 'being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whichever route may be considered expedient, and to that end remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries,' etc.

ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules substantially "—

Not fully—

"as embodied in the convention of Constantinople signed the 28th day of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and reasonable."

That is up to the signing of the treaty.

The treaty was adopted—ayes 72, noes 6.

UNDERSTANDING OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE THAT THE WORDS "VESSELS OF COMMERCE AND OF WAR OF ALL NATIONS" INCLUDED VESSELS OF THE UNITED STATES.

The only unquestionable evidence bearing upon this matter is the report from the Committee on Foreign Relations explaining the purpose and meaning of the treaty and the votes on proposed amendments.

The Committee on Foreign Relations, through its chairman, Senator C. K. Davis, conveyed to the Senate the committee's construction and understanding; and there appearing nothing to the contrary, it must be admitted that the Senate, in adopting the treaty, adopted the construction placed upon it by the committee.

THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE. (Report of Senator Davis, chairman:)

"No American statesman speaking with official authority or responsibility has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war and always open, on terms of impartial equality, to the ships and commerce of the world."

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the great oceans are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject, rather, belongs to the domain of international law."

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"Whatever canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien will be ultimately made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control."

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 22, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations without discrimination."

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"To set up the selfish motive of gain by establishing a monopoly of a highway that must derive its income from the patronage of all maritime countries would be unworthy of the United States if we owned the country through which the canal is to be built."

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"But the location of the canal belongs to other Governments, from whom we must obtain any right to construct a canal on their territory, and it is not unreasonable, if the question was new and was not involved in a subsisting treaty with Great Britain, that she should question the right of even Nicaragua and Costa Rica to grant to our ships of commerce and of war extraordinary privileges of transit through the canal."

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"It is not reasonable to suppose that Nicaragua and Costa Rica would grant to the United States the exclusive control of a canal through those States on terms less generous to the other maritime nations than those prescribed in the great act of October 22, 1888; or if we could compel them to give us such advantages over other nations, it would not be creditable to our country to accept them."

ON THE QUESTION OF SPECIAL PRIVILEGES WITH REFERENCE TO TOLLS BECAUSE THE CANAL WAS BUILT WITH OUR OWN MONEY.

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"That our Government or our people will furnish the money to build the canal presents the single question whether it is profitable to do so. If the canal, as property, is worth more than its cost, we are not called on to divide the profits with other nations. If it is worth less and we are compelled by national necessities to build the canal, we have no right to call on other nations to make up the loss to us. In any view, it is a venture that we will enter upon if it is to our interest, and if it is otherwise we will withdraw from its further consideration."

"The Suez Canal makes no discrimination in its tolls in favor of its stockholders and, taking its profits or the half of them as our basis of calculation, we will never find it necessary to differentiate our rates of toll in favor of our own people in order to secure a very great profit on the investment."

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE:

"In time of war, as in time of peace, the commerce of the world will pass through its portals in perfect security, enriching all the nations, and we of the English-speaking peoples will either forget that this grand work has ever cost us a day of bitterness or we will rejoice that our contentions have delayed our progress until the honor has fallen to our grand Republic to number this among our best works for the good of mankind."

SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO UNITED STATES SENATE. (Speaking through Senator Morgan, special report:)

"The treaty under consideration is for the avowed purpose of removing any objection that may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the United States, without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of the convention.

"That 'general principle,' as it is modified or specially defined in this treaty, is all that is left of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as now being in continuing force.

"All that is left of this general treaty is the 'general principle' provided in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That is, that the vessels of all nations using the canal should be treated with exact equality, without discrimination in favor of the vessels of any nation."

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE. (Speaking through Senator Morgan, special report:)

"Then this convention, in article 2, proceeds to define and formulate into an agreement, intended to be world-wide in its operation, 'the general principle of neutralization,' established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty on the basis of the treaty of Constantinople of October, 1888, relating to the Suez Canal.

"Nothing is given to the United States in article 2 of the convention now under consideration, nor is anything denied to us that is not given or denied to all other nations."

VOTE OF SENATE ON ATTEMPT TO MODIFY THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY SO AS TO EXEMPT OUR COASTWISE VESSELS.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY SENATOR BARD:

Strike out all of article 3 and substitute the following:

"ART. 3. The United States reserves the right in the regulation and management of the canal to discriminate in respect to the charges of traffic in favor of its own citizens engaged in the coastwise trade."

ANSWER OF SENATE:

Vote—ayes 27, noes 43.

UNDERSTANDING OF THE NEGOTIATORS OF THE HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY THAT AMERICAN VESSELS WERE INCLUDED IN ITS TERMS.

The treaty was made and worked into form by Hay and Lansdowne. Hay spoke through American Ambassador Choate and Chargé d'Affaires White. Lansdowne spoke through Ambassador Pauncefote and Chargé d'Affaires Lowther.

MR. CHOATE, AMERICAN AMBASSADOR, TO THE UNITED STATES. March 25, 1914. (Letter answering inquiry of Senator McCumber:)

"First. Was it understood by the state departments of the two countries that the words 'vessels of commerce and war of all nations' included our own vessels?

"Second. Was it understood that these words also included our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade?

"I answer both of these questions most emphatically in the affirmative. The phrase quoted, 'vessels of commerce and war of all nations,' certainly included our own vessels, and was so understood by our own State Department and by the foreign office of Great Britain. It was understood by the same parties that these words also included our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade."

MR. CHOATE, AMERICAN AMBASSADOR, TO THE UNITED STATES. (Same letter:)

"By article 2, clause 1, of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that of February 5, 1900, it was provided that 'the canal shall be free and open in time of war as in time of peace to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.'

"And the language used by article 3, clause 1, of the second Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, that now under consideration, is as follows: 'The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic.'"

"When we came to the negotiation of this last treaty, that of 1901, there was no question that, as between the United States and Great Britain, the canal should be open to the citizens and subjects of both on equal terms, and that it should also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State that brought itself within the category prescribed. On that point there was really nothing to discuss, and in the whole course of the negotiations there was never a suggestion on either side that the words 'the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations' meant anything different from the natural and obvious meaning of these words. Such language admitted of the exemption or exception of no particular kind of vessels of commerce and of war of any nation, whether of vessels engaged in foreign trade or coastwise trade, or of steam vessels or sailing vessels, or of black vessels or white vessels, or of iron vessels or wooden vessels. The parties to the negotiation tried to use terms of the meaning of which there could be no doubt or dispute, and they meant what they said and said what they meant."

MR. CHOATE, AMERICAN AMBASSADOR, TO THE UNITED STATES. (Same letter:)

"The exception or exemption of vessels of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade would have excepted or exempted something like five-sixths of the entire shipping of the United States—coastwise, 6,812,532 tons; foreign, 1,017,862 (World Almanac for 1914, p. 176)—and it is inconceivable, as it appears to me, that we should have intended, without saying a word on the subject, to except or exempt what would thus be approximately the entire shipping of the United States. Any such idea would have made the further negotiation of the treaty impossible and would have wrecked the purpose which both parties had in mind."

MR. CHOATE, AMERICAN AMBASSADOR, TO THE UNITED STATES. (Same letter:)

"Of course, I submitted from time to time as the negotiations proceeded the substance of all our negotiations to our Secretary of State in dispatches and private letters, all of which, or copies of which, are, as I believe, on file in the State Department, and are doubtless open to the examination of Senators. And Lord Pauncefote, in like manner, was in frequent communication with Lord Lansdowne or the foreign office of Great Britain, and, of course, submitted all that was said and done between us to them. So when what you refer to in your letter as the State Departments of the countries approved and adopted the result of our work and exchanged ratifications of the treaty as it stands they necessarily intended that the words 'the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations' included our own vessels as well as those of Great Britain, and also included our own vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. There was no kind of vessel that the words used did not include."

MR. WHITE, AMERICAN CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES, TO THE UNITED STATES. March 23, 1914. (Answering questions propounded by Senator MCCUMBER:)

"I was in constant touch, as secretary of the embassy, with these negotiations, each phase of which Mr. Choate was good enough to tell me of. Indeed, I was often present during their discussion of the question at issue, which took place for the most part at the embassy.

"Under these circumstances, there is but one way in which I can answer the inquiry contained in your letter 'as to the understanding of Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote on the question of the use of the canal by vessels engaged wholly in the coastwise trade,' to wit:

"(1) That the exemption of our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls was never suggested to, nor by, anyone connected with the negotiation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaties in this country or in England.

"(2) That from the day on which I opened the negotiations with Lord Salisbury for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty until the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the words 'all nations' and 'equal terms' were understood to refer to the United States as well as to all other nations by every one of those, whether American or British, who had anything to do with the negotiations whereof the treaty last mentioned was the result."

MR. HAY, SECRETARY OF STATE. 1904. (In conversation with Mr. W. F. Johnson:)

"I asked Col. Hay plumply if the treaty meant what it appeared to mean on its face, and whether the phrase 'vessels of all nations' was intended to include our own shipping or was to be interpreted as meaning 'all other nations.' He replied:

"'All means all. The treaty was not so long that we could not have made room for the word "other" if we had understood that it belonged there. All nations means all nations, and the United States is certainly a nation.'"

Mr. President, these are words we spoke to each other; these are the assurances upon which we asked the signature of the other party to a contract which must rest for its enforcement upon our national integrity. We are asked to maintain the sincerity of our words and the obligation of our treaty. What shall our answer be? Talk as we may, vote as we may, study as we may the wording of the final contract to find some technical excuse to avoid the natural meaning of the words "all nations," and to make them read "all other nations," we shall be unable to deceive ourselves or blind our eyes to the unassailable and unquestionable fact that we declared to the other party to this contract that "all nations" did include the United States, and that we are bound by every canon of national honor and good faith to give that treaty the same construction after it was signed as we did before the signatures of the parties were affixed.

The foregoing brief excerpts from our national and international discourse show conclusively—

That the policy of the Government from its earliest history has been equality of treatment of all vessels which might use any canal connecting the two oceans.

That this policy should control, no matter who owns the canal or where constructed.

That this policy was enacted into positive legislation in the "general principle" of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which provided: "It is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same [the canal] shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State"—

And so forth.

That when this Government approached Great Britain for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it gave emphatic assurances of our purpose to maintain that "general principle" of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty without impairment.

That at that time the people of the United States understood that the interest upon the investment and cost of maintenance of the canal should be met by tolls collected from all the vessels using the same, including all of our own vessels, as per estimates then presented and published.

That at that time the people of Great Britain were perfectly willing to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty if in the new treaty the vessels of that country should be allowed the use of the canal on the same terms as the vessels of the United States, and which equality should also apply to vessels of all other nations.

That upon this mutual understanding of purpose the two countries proceeded to put the new treaty into form.

That in the negotiations in formulating the new treaty the one party was insistent that this equality of treatment of all vessels of both countries should be preserved beyond question, and the other party as positively asserted that the right was preserved without impairment in the preamble of the new treaty and reasserted in section 1 of article 3 of the new treaty.

That all parties to the negotiation of the treaty—Hay, Choate, and White on the American side and Lansdowne and Pauncefote on the British side—declared most positively that they all understood the treaty to mean "equality of all vessels," including the American vessels, and (by Choate) that if it had not been so clearly understood the treaty never would have been agreed to.

That the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the Senate construes the treaty to mean that vessels of all nations included the vessels of the citizens of the United States.

That upon that report and without questioning the accuracy of its construction the Senate confirmed the treaty.

That an amendment to free our coastwise vessels from the operation of the treaty was voted down.

If we thought we had this right without the Bard amendment, then making that right certain could not possibly have done any harm.

If we thought we did not have this right and wished to secure it, then it was our duty to have voted for the amendment.

If we thought the other party to the contract was agreeing to it with the understanding that it compelled equal treatment of the vessels of both parties, but we believed that its words were not so certain and conclusive as to preclude us from giving it a different construction, then our act in closing that agreement with that misunderstanding, with that reservation in our minds, was a piece of downright deception, grossly shocking to individual morality, and most unworthy a great, powerful, honorable nation.

Mr. President, the obligations of national honor impose upon us the duty of giving that treaty a construction in accordance with the understanding of the representatives of both Governments at the time we entered into it, a duty from which no refined reasoning, no strained construction, no studied sophistry, and no pseudo-patriotism can ever relieve us. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rules of the Senate, occupants of the gallery are not permitted to express approval or disapproval, and they must obey the rules.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, by way of perfecting the substitute amendment to the pending bill offered by me on yesterday, I wish to add, in line 5, after the date "1902," the following words: "or the treaty with the Republic of Panama ratified February 26, 1904"; and I ask for a reprint of the substitute as so modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears none.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I am in favor of the passage of the pending bill, first, because it keeps intact the Nation's honor, and, second, because it repeals a subsidy to a monopoly. Some of our friends upon this side of the Chamber and some upon the other side of the Chamber fail to call this issue by its right name. Some Senators call it "tolls exemption," but I call it a subsidy. I think President Taft, who signed the bill which we are now undertaking to repeal, had the true conception of what it really is, and in a speech which he made before the Canadian Club in Ottawa, Canada, he used this language:

> The idea of Congress in passing the bill and my idea in signing it was that we were thus giving a subsidy to our coastwise ships between New York and San Francisco and Boston and Seattle, as we did in the early days to our transcontinental railways.

I think that is a true statement of just what this issue is. Some of our Democratic friends say that they feel that they ought to vote against this measure because the platform of the Democratic Party has committed them to that policy. Mr. President, I shall discuss that platform. I think I had a fair opportunity to observe the Baltimore convention, and I say to those of the Democratic faith who are seeking to base their vote upon that declaration in the platform, which contravenes the whole of the Democratic Party's history, all its traditions, and all its policies, that they are establishing themselves upon a very weak and a very dangerous foundation.

There is a declaration in that platform which says—and in order to be absolutely accurate, I shall read it—

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

What is meant by "American ships"? Some gentlemen say, "Why, that means, of course, all vessels flying the American flag." I know that those who drew it expected it to mean that; but when they stated they were in favor of exemption of American ships engaged in coastwise trade, what was the natural thought that came to the mind of every Democrat? It was that we were exempting ships of the United States doing the work of the Government for the whole people, not the ships of a monopoly doing private business for personal profit. The platform did not say "We are in favor of the exemption of ships owned by American citizens" from payment of tolls, but they clothed it in that very patriotic language of "the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade." But before that statement in the platform we find this declaration:

> We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

If we are to say the first declaration meant a subsidy to the coastwise shipping monopoly, then, according to these contradictory planks in the Democratic platform, you would give a subsidy to a monopoly engaged in the coastwise trade, not extending our commerce with the nations of this earth, not finding sale for the product of our labor, but, under the law, a monopoly that is without foreign competition. You would give a subsidy to them, and, under the guise of American ships, you would allow the Standard Oil ship flying the American flag, you would allow the Steel Trust ship flying the American flag, you would allow the Coal Trust ship flying the American flag to go through the canal without cost, but you would hold at its gates the ship loaded with the product of our labor consigned to some South American port, flying the American flag, and require it to pay a toll before you would allow it to pass through the canal.

If I were in favor of a subsidy of any character, I should give it to that ship and to those engaged in the merchant marine that operate in competition with the world, extend our trade, and find a market for our labor, instead of giving it to a monopoly that did neither, and that was absolutely, by reason of the law, protected against competition.

But I do not stop there in the consideration of this question before the Democratic convention. This platform goes further:

> At this time when the Republican Party after a generation of unlimited power in its control of the Federal Government is rent into factions, it is opportune to point to the record of accomplishment of the Democratic House of Representatives in the Sixty-second Congress. We indorse its action, and we challenge comparison of its record with that of any Congress which has been controlled by our opponents.

Mr. President, what was the rock upon which we built our hope and our faith in the battle of 1912? For almost 20 years we had been out of power. Our Republican brethren had controlled both branches of Congress and the Presidency. For the first time in that length of time we had been trusted by the American people with control of the great House of Representatives, and we built our hopes for success upon the rock of accomplishment and the acts of the House of Representatives in that Congress.

Upon this very question of giving a subsidy to this coastwise monopoly, when the roll was called and the Democratic membershi of that House answered, a majority of the Democrats voted against this subsidy. This platform indorses that Democratic House of Representatives. It indorses its acts. One of it acts was that a majority of its membership, under a roll call of record, had voted against this very provision.

I say, Mr. President, and as I declare it I measure my words and weigh them well, that if that great convention had known the full facts and this question had been presented to them in the open, those favoring this subsidy saying this exemption of tolls to American ships meant a subsidy to this monopoly, that convention would not have adopted this plank by a vote of 723 to 125, as is shown by a poll recently taken of those delegates who constituted that convention, but I believe that out of the entire membership in it this policy of subsidy would not have received 100 of the votes there assembled. Three of the best known tenets of my party which I have been taught are a tariff for revenue only, taxation of the fortunes of the rich, and opposition to subsidy. I challenge any man who claims to speak the language of my party to name three better known or better loved principles of the Democratic Party.

I do not have to stop there, however. In my judgment, the reason for adopting this plank favoring exemption from tolls or a subsidy for American ships, if that is to be the construction given to it—American ships that were owned largely by that dominating financial force which that convention, by resolution, said they wanted no President to be controlled by—was to drive through this body, in which that bill was then pending, this tolls exemption or subsidy proposition.

I am not wandering upon strange ground when I declare that my party has always opposed a subsidy. I have a record of its platforms in the past. The very shibboleth of it, "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none," is enough, if no more.

As the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] suggests, under a poll of the delegates since made, when this question was submitted to them, more than 726 of the delegates that have replied voted in favor of the repeal and only 125 were opposed to it.

When I came to Congress, nearly 12 years ago, the first battle I saw fought by my party was against a subsidy.

Let us see, however, what the party has said before.

In our platform of 1900, what did we say? Here it is:

We denounce the lavish appropriations of recent Republican Congresses, which have kept taxes high and which threatened the perpetuation of the oppressive war levies. We oppose the accumulation of a surplus, to be squandered in such barefaced frauds upon the taxpayers as the shipping subsidy—

Barefaced frauds! Why, now you call it something else.

Such barefaced frauds as the shipping subsidy bill, which, under the false pretense of prospering American shipbuilding, would put unearned millions into the pockets of favorite contributors to the Republican campaign fund.

That was the Democratic platform of 1900; but we will not stop there. Let us see what they said in 1904.

The Democratic platform of 1904 uses this language:

We denounce the ship-subsidy bill recently passed by the United States Senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes, and a wasteful, illogical, and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstructions raised by Republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the sea.

We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

That was the declaration of our party in 1904.

In 1908, in the Democratic platform, we used this language:

We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

So our party in 1900, in 1904, and in 1908 has declared against subsidies of every character. It has said that it was undemocratic, that it was a barefaced fraud, that it was an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes. In our platform of 1912 we again reiterate our position of opposition to subsidies.

But what is the issue here now presented? Some of our distinguished friends say that we ought to allow this because if we do not we will surrender to England.

Mr. President, my hatred for England is not fierce enough to make me give a subsidy to a monopoly. Under the guise of "not surrendering to England" I am not going to surrender the Public Treasury of the United States of America to a shipping monopoly.

Surrendering to England? What are we surrendering to England? Our country made a treaty with them. I did not make it; our party did not make it; but men representing our country did make it. If that treaty, as I believe it does, denies us the right to give this character of subsidy to a monopoly, I hope to see more treaties made between this country and other countries that will deny us the giving of special privilege to private monopoly.

But it is the old cry over again. When they first came to the United States Congress and asked us to give them the right of subsidy, to take the people's money, the taxpayer's money, from their Treasury and give it to a favored few, generally, as in this case, a monopoly, they called it then a subsidy. They were defeated. The next time they came demanding the right to take from the Public Treasury so many million dollars and give it to a monopoly they called it a "subvention," and now they come, this time, and they call it a tolls exemption.

What are the facts, Mr. President? We built the Panama Canal. We taxed the American people $400,000,000 to build it. The canal is built. It has saved us in the time taken for transportation at least two-thirds of that formerly required. Now, these gentlemen are coming with their ships, not carrying the commerce of the Government—not at all. They speak of them as American ships, as if they were loaded down with the munitions of Uncle Sam. They call them American ships, as if they were doing the peculiar service of the Government, when they are privately owned ships carrying the commerce of other private citizens for money, for profit.

They come to the canal. Here it is. It has been built. Four hundred million dollars it has cost the producers of the United States of America. What is the price that it costs us for its upkeep? About $4,500,000 a year. Here comes one of the ships making immense profits. It goes up there, and the monopoly that owns it says to Uncle Sam, "Open your gates; give us a pilot; put your men on board; furnish the coal; furnish the power; furnish the labor; and take our ship 50 miles through the canal and empty it into the Pacific Ocean; but we are not going to pay you anything for it." It is true the ship monopoly is being paid by citizens who ship their goods, to transport them from coast to coast, but they want to have Uncle Sam—that is, all the people—to do for them without charge or cost that for which they have been abundantly paid by the shippers themselves to do.

Why, Senators, if it were proposed that we should give to every laborer in this country who did not make as much as $2 per day a subsidy that would make up the additional amount required in order to meet the $2 wage, Senators would call that socialism, and they would be right; but you are doing the very same thing, not for the poor fellow who digs into the earth or beats at the forge for his bread, but for a monopoly, and you call that Americanism!

Take this ship. You run it through the canal. The Government of the United States is responsible for every dollar of damage that is done to it. All we ask from this monopoly is simply this: We have reduced the time for you. We have made it possible for a ship to go from New York to San Francisco in one-third the time formerly required. We have given you an absolute monopoly, so far as the Government is concerned, against competition with foreign vessels. Now, all we ask of you is this: Just pay us what it will cost us to put you through the canal; that is all. We do not want any interest upon the $400,000,000 we have expended; we do not want any profit upon our investment, but we ask you in the way of tolls to pay your pro rata part of the charge that we have to pay in order to operate the canal.

Oh, but some of our friends tell me that the reason they are in favor of this exemption is because it will lower transportation rates. Yes! I never did see an advocate of a subsidy come up and meet the issue fairly and squarely. They always have some deceptive cry. It is always not for themselves—oh no—but for the dear people. "Just let us ram our hands into the Public Treasury and take the money out, and then we will give it back to the people in an indirect way." As the people already have the money, I would rather rely upon keeping it by holding it in the Treasury, rather than to hand it to them upon the theory that they will give it back to us again by a reduction of freight rates. One thing of which we can be certain the monopoly in any event will not give us more back than they took from us, so we in any event have nothing to gain.

That is the principle, however. Why, the advocate of this subsidy first dons the uniform of Uncle Sam; he grabs the American flag and waves it over his head, and cries, "Patriotism, patriotism, patriotism," when what he really means is "Plunder, plunder, plunder." Then, if that does not work, why, "We will say, then, that you are surrendering."

Let us see about the question of freight rates. Who is the best qualified man in this Government to speak upon the question of whether or not exemption from tolls will lower freight rates? Col. Goethals built the canal. I want to read to the Senate what he says upon this question of lowering freight rates, and I will read it. He says:

NO FREE TOLLS, SAYS COL. GOETHALS.

[A statement by Col. Goethals.]

My views on the economic side of the tolls question follow: Government will expend $375,000,000 for canal and intends to charge for its use. Basis of tolls given in Emory Johnston's report on Panama Canal traffic and tolls, pages 193, 194, and 195. These figures should be corrected for operating expenses, which will be $5,500,000, including depreciation.

I believe tolls should pay outstanding indebtedness, fixed charges, and operating expenses, leaving amounts appropriated from current revenues to be the contribution of the present generation toward canal, and because of unknown future conditions not burdening posterity for remainder. Bond issue to date under canal acts $134,631,980, interest on these approximately $3,200,000, annual amount to be set aside for redemption of bonds $3,250,000, operation and maintenance $5,500,000, annual payment to Panama $250,000. Amount to be secured annually through tolls is therefore $11,950,000. If additional bonds are issued, these figures should be changed accordingly.

To secure this amount through tolls—

Five million and five hundred thousand dollars—

it is necessary to charge all shipping, as indicated in report quoted. Established steamship companies fix rates after conference, and as they are in the business for profit will demand the highest rates the traffic will bear.

Yes; this beneficent Shipping Trust that is so patriotic now, clad in the habiliments of Uncle Sam and waving his red, white, and blue colors, whenever it gets the subsidy, Col. Goethals says, it will have a conference and do what? Demand the highest rates the traffic will bear.

These rates will be independent of tolls. It follows that exemptions from tolls will not give cheaper rates from coast to coast to either shipper or receiver, but will increase profits to shipping companies.

And yet, because the President of the United States of America has asked Congress to repeal a law of this character that will do nothing more, according to Col. Goethals, than to pour money into the pockets of the shipping monopoly he is denounced as a surrenderer of American rights, and it is said that he is afraid to defend American honor. He is charged with cowardice, and every other charge imaginable is brought against him. Why? Because the profits are not permitted to flow from the people's Treasury into the pockets of these gentlemen who own this shipping monopoly. When the Alaskan railroad is built will gentlemen here insist that after the Government has expended $40,000,000 in constructing it that the freight of the Gugenheim-Morgan syndicate shall be transported over it without charge? Will they say the American taxpayers built and paid for it in order that monopoly might use it free? Speaking for myself—and, I know, for the people of Kentucky—I consider such a contention as the very acme of special privilege and the worst of subsidies.

Col. Goethals proceeds:

The same is applicable to rates from interior points to either coast. Agreements will be made between railroads and ships for through rail and water rates same as at present, and rates divided between two interests as per agreement. Again, exempted tolls will not give lower rates to shipper or receiver.

Therefore free tolls to vessels engaged in coastwise trade result in a subsidy to a class of shipping already fully protected and not in need of subsidy.

You can not even claim that they need the subsidy. You can not even claim that they are not fully protected in everything in these two governmental advantages by law, and you now want to give them a subsidy.

Col. Goethals continues:

I do not believe in exemption of tolls for coastwise trade, first, because this amounts to a subsidy to a class of shipping and will benefit stockholders and not shippers; second, because this canal will need all the revenue it can get to pay its current expenses and indebtedness.

Our position is let the ships pay for this themselves. The other gentlemen want the taxpayers to pay for it.

I suppose Col. Goethals wants to surrender after he went at the risk of his life to construct this great improvement.

But what is the next question that is brought up. I notice, Mr. President, that some of my Democratic friends are very solicitous about the Democratic platform. They are the special guardians of the party faith upon this particular issue. I have as much respect and as much loyalty and as much devotion for a Democratic platform as any man upon this floor, but let us see what it is upon this question where there are two declarations against a subsidy and one of doubtful construction for it.

I want to point out one plank in this platform of the Democratic party of which there was no earthly doubt. It is not susceptible of a double construction. It has no contradictory provisions in it.

I expect to show, Mr. President, that some of the gentlemen who are assailing us most bitterly for violating what they contend is a declaration for a subsidy have themselves been the first offenders.

I do not cite that to justify the ac. of any other Democrat who may be unwilling to follow the direction of his party in its platform, but I submit it for the purpose of showing that these gentlemen had the opportunity first to show loyalty to the platform where a subsidy was not involved and they were not very active in its defense.

What is that plank? In the House of Representatives, the Democratic House of the Sixty-second Congress, there was introduced what was known as the Cullop amendment. It was offered as an amendment to a bill creating a new judicial district and providing for the appointment of a judge. It was introduced for the purpose of requiring the President of the United States to make public the names of all persons and all communications in relation to the appointment or any recommendation made in regard to the appointment of a judge.

That amendment was adopted by the Democratic House of Representatives. I was a Member of the House at that time and voted for it, and it came to this body, which was then Republican, and it was defeated.

When we assembled in the Baltimore convention with that question fresh in our minds a plank upon the provision of publicity was made to apply directly to such cases, and the cause for its adoption was the defeat by the Republican Senate of that very provision in the House bill. The reason for that provision in the Democratic platform was this: There was great unrest in the country in regard to the judiciary. Col. Roosevelt himself was advocating the recall of Federal decisions. Many gentlemen of distinction and ability were advocating the recall of Federal judges. The Democratic Party sought to throw the light of publicity around these appointments. We adopted this plank for that purpose, and I want to read it:

We note with gratification the unanimous sentiment in favor of publicity, before the election, of campaign contributions—a measure demanded in our national platform of 1908, and at that time opposed by the Republican Party—and we commend the Democratic House of Representatives for extending the doctrine of publicity to recommendations, verbal and written, upon which presidential appointments are made.

The one thing which caused the insertion in the platform of that plank was the amendment known as the Cullop amendment to the bill creating a judicial district.

And, Mr. President, why not? A judge holds the scales in which the life of a human being is weighed. He holds the scales in which the property rights of our citizens are weighed. As to this important official, who has within his keeping the happiness, the property, and the lives of our citizens, the Democratic Party said that every light that can shine ought to be thrown around such recommendations and appointments.

The Democratic Party wrote that in its platform. Yet my distinguished friend Senator O'GORMAN assails all bitterly who refuse to accept the version of that 1912 Democratic plank as applying to a subsidy. I have the record to show, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, when a like bill went before that committee with an amendment providing for publicity which came from this present Democratic House, and that committee reported it to the Senate with an amendment striking out the publicity amendment. We did not see Senator O'GORMAN, heroic and powerful, towering with drawn sword as a defender of the Democratic platform and assailing all those who refused to follow as a betrayer of the Democratic trust.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not suppose the Senator from Kentucky would be guilty of any unfair statement regarding one of his colleagues; but on a former occasion when he alluded to this incident I told him in the Senate that I was not present at a meeting of the Judiciary Committee when that action was taken, and I was advised within half an hour afterwards that the Senator himself went to the clerk of the Judiciary Committee and asked for the record of those who were present at that meeting. The record which was shown to him disclosed the fact that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the junior Senator from New York did not attend the meeting.

While there might have been some excuse for the Senator's reference to this matter on a former occasion, in the light of the information which he received from the clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary, I will leave it to the judgment of my colleagues whether there is any possible excuse, justification, or extenuation for the repetition of the statement on this occasion.

Mr. JAMES. Did the Senator from New York follow my language? I said that the Senator from New York was a member of the Judiciary Committee, and that committee struck out that amendment, and it was so reported to the Senate, and that I did not see the Senator defending that Democratic promise.

But the Senator has not looked at the record, happily for my position. Mr. President, I have the record here myself. The one to which I at one time in the Senate alluded and to which the Senator says that he was not present does not apply to the Chilton bill which I have in front of me with the record notes of the proceedings of that committee, and I shall read it:

Mr. CHILTON called up S. 577, authorizing the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the fourth circuit. Upon motion of Mr. O'GORMAN, the bill was ordered reported favorably, and Mr. CHILTON requested to make the report.

The Senator from New York will not say that I misrepresent him in this record I have read. Mr. President, the purpose of the Democratic Party in adopting that particular plank to which I referred was caused by the Cullop amendment; and does the Senator say he had not knowledge that the House again had passed such an amendment to the Palmer bill?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. But if the Senator was not there, I point him to the Democratic platform which requires publicity in the case of all appointments; and here he is creating a new appointment, and he does not apply the plank of the Democratic platform which he himself helped to make to a provision of the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JAMES. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator from Kentucky state that at the meeting to which he now refers the subject of which he speaks was under consideration or discussion?

Mr. JAMES. Oh, it ought to have been.

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; I am asking was it?

Mr. JAMES. I do not know what was under discussion. I know that you reported out a bill with that provision of publicity left out. The Senator may escape my charge by saying that he was not present when the committee struck out the House amendment, but he can not escape the charge that the Chilton bill, that was before his own committee, had no such amendment to it, but ought to have had one, and the Senator did not offer one, but moved to report it out without a publicity amendment, and it was reported out and passed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Then, Mr. President, it seems that all the committee did on the occasion to which the Senator refers was to confirm an appointment made by the President of the United States.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, not at all, Mr. President. The Senator is clearly mistaken. The committee was considering a bill creating a new judicial district and providing for an appointment by the President. The Senator misstates the whole issue.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The bill originated in the House?

Mr. JAMES. I do not know whether the bill originated in the House or in the Senate, but it was in the Senate, and the bill was for the purpose of creating a new judicial district and a new judge, and not for the purpose of confirming an appointment. The Senator is very badly mixed up in his cards. He is not as familiar with Democratic platforms as I anticipated that he was.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not claim any particular familiarity with cards; I leave that distinction to the Senator from Kentucky; but I repeat, as I have said on a previous occasion, that at no time in my presence at a meeting of the Judiciary Committee was the question discussed as to whether the President of the United States had failed to comply with the provisions of the platform requiring that all indorsements for judicial positions should accompany——

Mr. JAMES. Again the Senator has mistaken the issue. The question was not what the President had done about making public any recommendation given to him. That was not the issue. The Senator helped to write the Democratic platform in which there was a plank which said that it was our policy to require by law all recommendations and all indorsements to be made public. My position is that the Senator as a legislator was helping to pass the bill through the Senate and did not carry out the promise of the Democratic platform in regard to that provision. The President had nothing to do with it. The President made no recommendation. It was a bill introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. Not only that, Mr. President, but I have the record here of many other bills creating other new judicial districts and providing for appointments of judges that were introduced and before the committee of which the distinguished Senator from New York was a member, and to not a single one of those bills was there an amendment offered putting in effect the plank in the Democratic platform made at Baltimore.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I, too, am a member of the Judiciary Committee, and all the strictures addressed to the Senator from New York equally apply to myself. I therefore want to be clear about the attitude of the Senator from Kentucky. There is a plank in the platform calling for legislation requiring that the President of the United States should make public all recommendations for public office.

Mr. JAMES. Not at all. The Senator does not understand the platform. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Well, I am trying to understand the Senator. I understand he complains because the Democratic members of the Judiciary Committee, when the bill he speaks of was under consideration by it, did not offer an amendment calling upon the President——

Mr. JAMES. Providing by law.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. JAMES. That was the cause originally of the plank being placed in the platform.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the Senator distinctly. Accordingly every act of any kind which has during the present session come before this body, under the provisions of which any new office has been created, must carry with it a provision——

Mr. JAMES. Oh, the Senator, Mr. President, is not frank. The Senator is not fair in that statement.

Mr. WALSH. That when the officer is appointed the President of the United States shall make public the recommendations given concerning that office, and every Democrat here who, being a member of a committee to which any legislation of that character was submitted, did not propose an amendment of that kind is equally subject to the strictures of the Senator.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator need not undertake to interpret my speech. I want to say to the Senator that if he had read recently that plank of the platform he would not have made that statement. The reason why that plank was written in the platform was to apply particularly to the appointment of judges. That is why it was written there. And to whom would we look to throw the white light of publicity around judicial appointments except to such guardians of Democracy as Senator O'GORMAN and Senator WALSH? You gentlemen were upon the committee, and you can not escape whatever responsibility attaches to that neglect to carry out the promises of the Democratic platform by saying that some other Democratic Senator who was not on the committee and knew nothing about it ought to have done what you yourselves failed to do.

Mr. O'GORMAN and Mr. WALSH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. JAMES. I will yield to either Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask the Senator if the meaning is not that there should be general legislation to that effect?

Mr. JAMES. I say to the Senator that the reason why it was written into the platform was because it was attached to a bill just like the one the committee of which he is a member struck it from and just like the others to which the committee failed to apply it. I can only answer the Senator by saying that the thing that brought about the writing of that plank I suppose was the thing that we desired to remedy.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator from Kentucky was a Member of this body when the bill to which he alludes passed this body.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly I was a Member of it, but I knew nothing about it. I was at that time, if the Senator will permit me, relying upon him. I knew what a guardian he was of the Democratic platform. I was out helping to make the tariff bill. I was sitting night and day in company with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] on a subcommittee when this performance was going on, and I relied upon the Senator from New York. I will swear I did. [Laughter.] I had implicit confidence in the Senator from New York. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Was the Senator from Kentucky surprised that none of the Democratic membership of this body raised the point to which he referred.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator must not seek to escape by trying to secure from me a censure of his colleagues. I can not agree to do that, Mr. President.

I can not agree to that, Mr. President, because we all know that Senators who are on the committees are those to whom we look for guidance when a bill is brought before this body.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, no matter what excuses may be offered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky exculpating himself from responsibility for legislation which he now condemns——

Mr. JAMES. Oh, Mr. President, I am not the special guardian of the Democratic platform, as is the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Evidently the Senator to-night thinks he is the special representative of certain elements of the party, and is making as good a defense of their party perfidy as his great ability makes possible.

Mr. JAMES. Perfidy! Mr. President, the idea of that word escaping the lips of one who advocates taking the public money and giving it to a monopoly as a subsidy! Perfidy indeed! [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Occupants of the galleries must not express approval or disapproval of anything which takes place on the floor of the Senate; and the Chair will insist on the observance of the rule.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I simply brought forward these Democratic acts and Democratic platform utterances in order to clarify in some degree the atmosphere in this Chamber. Suppose my friend the Senator from New York would yield to me to offer an amendment providing, as to the farmers of my State—and they are good people; they are deserving people; they are patriotic people—that a subsidy should be given to them of this sort, allowing them to ship or to have transported through the mails by parcel post, and that they should be exempt from postage to the extent of a hundred dollars per year in sending their eggs, their meat, and products of the soil to the market; that would be called socialism; that would be denounced vehemently; but when you have given it to a monopoly it rises above such low earth as that and treads upon the purer heights and mountain top of statesmanship. Whenever you take from all the people and give to a particular class, and especially if that class is a monopoly and does not need it, and is very rich, why, of course, that is Americanism; and gentlemen who do not do that must forever wear the brand of yielding cowardlike to Great Britain.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I can not resist stating to the Senator from Kentucky that I think he, in common with the greater part of the Senators from the South, voted for a subsidy to eradicate the cotton boll weevil, and some of the rest of us were duped into voting for it, too. Now, "acknowledge the corn." You did it in your interest——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I have never heard the question of a subsidy raised; have never seen an attempt to take the public money and give it to a monopoly as a subsidy advocated by anybody in this Chamber when it was assailed that they did not talk about the cotton boll weevil.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Call it what you may, it is much of the same character, according to your idea.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, Mr. President, happily I can see a difference between taking a couple of million dollars a year out of the Public Treasury and ramming it into the pockets of a monopoly owned by a lot of very rich people up on the coast of New England and in New York, and appropriating a sum of money to try to eradicate the boll weevil that is destroying all the cotton of the toiling farmers, who wring from the earth under the sunny skies of Dixie that product which keeps the balance of the world's trade in our favor. Bless your soul, Senator, if you do not see any difference between those two things, your Democratic education has been sadly neglected. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate and the galleries must be in order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, my education in the cause of Democracy has been at a shrine as pure and holy as that of the Senator from Kentucky. I say it is well for the Senator to defend his side of the question in breaking up a Democratic platform, but call it "subsidy" or whatever else you may, it is of the same kin and character as the illustration to which I have referred.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I am perfectly content with my position. I am willing to account to the great people of Kentucky; and when the Senator from New Jersey speaks of the Democratic platform, to which one of the three planks does he refer—the two against subsidy or the doubtful one in favor of it? Whatever I may do about construing Democratic platforms, no President of my party will ever have me standing with the enemy firing upon him when he is fighting the greatest battle that was ever fought in favor of human rights and in the interests of the great mass of the American people.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me a moment to call his attention to the fact that the Democracy in not a single one of the 48 States authorized this subsidy to be put into the Democratic platform?

Mr. JAMES. Why, certainly not, Mr. President. You could not get 50 in a Kentucky Democratic convention of a thousand delegates to advocate a subsidy. It is antagonistic to the whole history and the whole teaching of the Democratic Party from beginning to end.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; and you could not have got 50, I believe, in all the States of the Union that would have voted to expend money for the building of the Panama Canal, at a cost of $400,000,000, had they known that this was to be the policy of the United States Senate.

Mr. JAMES. Why, Mr. President, that is just where the Senator from New Jersey is in error. After the people dug the canal, at a cost of $400,000,000 to the taxpayers, then you take your ships there and say: "Here, take charge of us now; run us through. It will cost you on an average of $3,000 per ship, but you take us and run us through." Why do you not send the Government wagons out to the farmers in this country and haul their products to town free of charge. It would be just as fair as it is to haul the ships of monopoly through the canal without any charge. Why do you not pay the laborer's way to and from his daily toil? He needs it worse than this Rockefeller-Morgan-Wall Street monopoly does. But the worst of it all is you take from the farmer and the laborer and give to the monopoly

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator would go backward. The same argument that he advances would establish toll gates on every highway in our land.

Mr. JAMES. Ah, Mr. President, after we have dug the canal, after the ships go up to it, then your monopoly is not satisfied with the great expenditure of money. We do not want any profit; we do not ask any interest on the money; we ask only that you pay your proportionate part of the work we do for you; that is all, and nothing more. It reminds me of the fellow down in my community who would not work, and after the neighbors had become tired of giving him this and giving him that, aiding him and feeding him, a few of the boys, in a spirit of deviltry, one day said, "We will take this fellow, put him in a coffin, haul him to the graveyard, and bury him." They put him in the coffin and started with him to the graveyard, and as they were going along they met an old farmer with a load of corn, and he said, "Boys, who is dead?" They said, "Bill Jones." He said, "Is he dead?" They said, "No; but we are going to bury him anyhow." He said, "My goodness, you are not going to bury him alive, are you?" They said, "Why, certainly." He inquired why. They said, "Because he will not work. We have been giving him and giving him, and he will not do anything to support himself." The old man said, "Boys, do not do that; I will give him a load of corn." The fellow stuck his head out of the coffin and said, "Is it shelled?" The farmer said, "No." The man in the coffin said, "Drive on, then." [Laughter.] That is the way with the ship monopoly. After we have expended $400,000,000 digging that canal for them, then they come to the canal and say, "You dug it for us; now put us through it."

My friend the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], always happy and eloquent in expressing himself, proceeded to tell us in that very elaborate and excellent discourse he made on this subject that President Wilson had signed the death warrant of the Democratic Party. Mr. President, I should have expected that prophecy from some one upon the other side—some of our Republican friends, but not from a Democratic Senator, especially from Mississippi. I have heard the funeral of the Democratic Party preached many times, but always from the other side. They have told us of the impending death of this party of Democracy which was born before the Constitution and has buried every party that has contended against it, and I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that if it shall ever go to its grave, which God forbid, the hand that takes its life will do something more than sign a bill repealing a subsidy to a monopoly. Signing a bill repealing a special privilege to a monopoly will come as near killing the Democratic Party as proclaiming anew the Ten Commandments would in killing the Christian religion.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi tells us that ROOT and Bryan are going hand in hand, side by side. Everybody nowadays takes a lick at Mr. Bryan, but under each blow which they deal him he grows in strength and in the love and the confidence of the American people. ROOT and Bryan side by side. What a powerful argument to drive the Democrats in favor of a subsidy. I, Mr. President, have always taken the position that I would not allow some one with whom I disagreed to select my position for me, and I would not allow the fact that Senator ROOT was in favor of repealing the subsidy to drive me from its support.

But if that powerful argument, so subtle and brilliant, is to have an effect, let me see with whom the distinguished Senator, my beloved friend from Mississippi, is associated. If companionship and comradeship in this struggle is to be the brand of infamy, behold the hero of Mississippi marching down to the good old State where the cotton blossoms, advocating this subsidy to this monopoly, upon one side of him the distinguished Senator GALLINGER and upon the other side of him the distinguished Senator SMOOT, and directly in front of him BOIES PENROSE, of Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. JAMES. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Kentucky, Mr. President, honors me by calling me by name, contrary to the rules of this body.

Mr. JAMES. I withdraw that, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. But no matter about that, I simply rise——

Mr. JAMES. I meant no offense at all; I merely desired to put the Senator from Mississippi in good company.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply rise to say, Mr. President, that the performance that is going on to-night is an illustration of "how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

Mr. JAMES. And how good and how pleasant it is for that statement to come from one who has so recently dwelt in such harmony and unity with his own colleagues. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. President, I say if that argument is a good one now, I point to the fact that Senator VARDAMAN is following the leadership of Senators upon the other side of the Chamber and following a majority of the Republicans of this Chamber. I do not present that argument because it has any merit; I present it because I deem it a worthy and fit reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from Mississippi.

Speaking for the great Commonwealth of Kentucky, I rejoice to take my stand with President Wilson. Practically the men of that State of all parties and creeds are supporting him in this battle against subsidy. I delight in the thought that no monopoly can make our President surrender the people's money to it. No fake or false cry of "surrender" can drive him from the position that a Nation's honor must be as pure as the mothers' hearts who prayed, as clean as the fathers' hands who fought to create this great Republic to have it take its place among the nations of the earth. Mr. President, against the insolent demands of this monopoly for this subsidy I place the rights of every taxpayer in this Nation: those who by toil in the field and the forest, the shop and the factory pay the taxes that built this canal, pay the taxes that must operate and maintain it. In their interest I solemnly and emphatically insist that this great engineering feat shall not be made the vehicle upon which greed shall raid the Public Treasury and exploit our people.

Mr. President, the people of the United States of America demand the repeal of the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act; first, because it violates this Nation's honor; and, second, because it violates the best-known principle of popular government—equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss any phase of this question that I mentioned in my address to the Senate on the 9th of May, but I wish briefly to allude to two points in connection with it which have been given prominence in the debate since that time.

Some Democratic Senators in this body who are opposed to the repeal of the exemption clause of the canal act lay great stress on the fact that a provision of the Baltimore convention declared in favor of the exemption of American vessels in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls.

I think that I realize as much as any other party man the general obligation of observing the declarations contained in a party platform; but I wish to say, further, that the principle has its limitations. It is to be presumed that a plank in a platform is placed there by its framers because they suppose that the effect of it will be conducive to the general interest, and just so long as they are satisfied that that plank is conducive to the general interest they are justified in standing by that provision, but not one moment longer.

If it should become evident to the members of a political party after a declaration had been put in a platform that its effect would not be conducive to the public interest, it is their duty to the public not only to refrain from trying to carry it into effect, but if any steps have been taken to carry it into effect, then patriotism and public duty require that they should endeavor to undo what they have already done in that direction.

I have not the slightest idea, if the report of the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, following their investigation of shipping combinations, and likewise the testimony taken recently before the Senate Interoceanic Canal Committee, had been known before the meeting of the Baltimore convention that the tolls-exemption plank would ever have gone into it.

At this time those who are satisfied from the investigation that has been made since and from the evidence that has been adduced which was not accessible before that that particular plank in the platform is wrong are justified in not insisting upon it, and would not be justified if they did not strive to repeal it to the extent of undoing anything that has already been done in the direction of putting it into effect. Nor have I the slightest idea that President Wilson, if that knowledge had been in his possession at the time he made that New Jersey speech, which has been so harped upon here by the Democratic as well as the Republican opponents of repeal, would have made it.

I know that I changed my position on the subject on account of this new evidence that was not accessible before; the knowledge brought to me that had not been and could not be brought to me before; and I assume that the President of the United States has just as much right as I have to change his opinion, based upon a sincere conviction that he was mistaken in the premises. I say that I honor him, I feel far more respect for him for the position he now occupies since he has discovered that his first position was wrong than if he had continued to maintain that position just because it was a part of the party platform.

To one who persists in a course which he had originally adopted because he thought it was right, and who still thinks it is right, can be applied the expression that "consistency is a jewel"; but to him who persists in a course that he has once adopted because he thought it was right, but now is convinced that it is wrong, can be applied the expression, "Consistency is the main virtue of fools."

I think that those Democrats in this body who are so much disturbed on account of the change of position of the President on this question since he made that New Jersey speech are very unduly disturbed, much more disturbed on account of it than the President himself is.

It has also been stated, with more or less dramatic effect, by Democratic Members of this body who are opposed to repeal that if this bill is passed it will mean the loss of power of the Democratic Party in the approaching elections; and if it shall happen that the party loses in the fall elections, or that its power is considerably decreased, they will most certainly claim that the effect was due to that cause, and in the nature of things it could not be proven that it was not so. I said in my address of the 9th of March that if the Democratic Party should be defeated in the approaching elections it would not be due to the passage of this bill, but to other causes; and, of course, if that contingency should happen, I would not be able, either, to prove the truth of my assertions. Even, however, if the party should be defeated for that reason, in my judgment, it is far better that it should be defeated on account of trying to uphold the right than succeed on account of trying to uphold the wrong, for I believe that in the ultimate outcome any political party will be benefited by an adherence to principle, rather than by a resort to expediency.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 12045) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of the Civil War, disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12045, an omnibus pension bill, disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. ADAIR, and Mr. LANGHAM.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14034, the naval appropriation bill, disagree to all of the Senate amendments thereto, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14034, the naval appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments thereto, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee about some of the Senate amendments. As I observe, quite a number of amendments have been placed in the bill by the Senate in which the appropriations are made available until expended. It seems to me that that is a departure from the line of holding in appropriations, having them extend from year to year. It is not a good policy to pursue.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that in the House we fixed a time limit, and I am in sympathy with the views expressed by the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I would not want the conferees to agree to those provisions, so far as I am concerned, without giving the House an opportunity to vote upon them and to express its opinion as to whether it desires to agree to a lot of appropriations that shall be available until expended.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The chairman of the committee originally carried the same identical provision in his bill, and of course there will be great pressure brought to bear on the conferees to insist upon their agreeing to what they originally wanted in the bill. I think it is nothing but proper for us, if necessary and the committee thinks they need that backing up, to instruct the conferees to insist upon the views of the House.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think on that question it is necessary.

Mr. GARNER. I am very glad to hear the chairman state that. The chairman will remember that this matter was discussed at the time.

Mr. PADGETT. And the gentleman will remember the position the chairman took on the floor of the House.

Mr. GARNER. I recall it very well. I called it to the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee in the second item that carried this particular language, and he agreed then to limit it to two years, thinking that would be sufficient to carry out the needs of the Navy Department. I hope he will insist that the House provisions remain in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, there is one other matter that I desire to ask the chairman about, and that is amendment No. 71, in reference to the sale of two battleships now belonging to the Navy, namely, the Idaho and the Mississippi. This is such a radical departure that I could not consent, without sufficient debate, to agree to that until we would have an opportunity to consider the question in the House.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman what I stated to the leader of the minority, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], on yesterday, in conversation, that that is a matter upon which the House has not expressed itself, and I will state for myself, and as far as I am able for the conferees, that that matter will be brought to the House and the House will have an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. So that the conferees would not agree to that amendment without a thorough discussion of the matter in the House?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, amendment No. 72 makes all of the appropriations in this bill immediately available.

Mr. PADGETT. There will be no necessity for that, because it will be July when the bill is passed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may not be July, but I believe that the House should have an opportunity to pass upon that amendment before it is agreed to. It absolutely destroys our whole fiscal system. It will destroy the fiscal year.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman need not worry himself over that amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Upon the assurance that the House, if the Senate is insistent upon the amendment, will have an opportunity to express its views before any agreement is reached, I shall not oppose it at this time.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think the gentleman need give himself any anxiety with respect to that.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. I do not know the number of the amendment, but I understand the Senate has reinserted the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to contract with the Union Iron Works for patronage to a private dock, which they are to construct in San Francisco Bay, at $50,000 a year, and I would like to know what the view of the chairman is in respect to that amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. That is the same provision which the committee reported, and, speaking frankly to the gentleman, I should be inclined to concur in the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the Senate passed a bill in which it provided that not more than $50,000 a year should be paid for the use of that dock. My recollection is the amendment in the bill is that at least $50,000 shall be paid. That is a somewhat radical change of position on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PADGETT. This is the provision that was in the House bill.

Mr. MANN. The Senate amendment provides for an expense of $50,000 a year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate passed a bill some time ago providing that not more than $50,000 a year should be paid. I believe the House should have an opportunity to vote on that question as to whether we will subsidize a private company to build a dock or whether the Government should build the dry dock itself.

Mr. BRYAN. This matter is of more importance than ordinarily would be thought, because if these battleships are docked at Hunters Point the Union Iron Works will have the repairs, which will amount to a tremendous expenditure. The Government has a thoroughly equipped dock at Puget Sound and will have another one down at the Panama Canal, and why a third dock should be established at Hunters Point at Government expense and owned by a private concern I can not see.

Mr. PADGETT. It is not to be at the Government expense; the contract is only to run for not exceeding six years. I have no objection to submitting it to the House and letting the House pass on the matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will never be ready for the ships that pass through the Panama Canal at the opening.

Mr. PADGETT. No; the contract provides that it is to be established in two years.

Mr. BRYAN. The understanding is that they have got to have this dry dock for commercial ships, and that the dock will be constructed whether Uncle Sam makes a contribution or not. The objection I have is that it involves the dockage and repairing of ships in a private concern.

Mr. PADGETT. This is no contribution; it is simply for the use of the dock. It is 900 miles north to Bremerton and 1,500 or 2,000 miles, I think, to Balboa dock. The Government can use the dock at a cost of not exceeding $50,000 a year, and I think will make a great saving.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course, this is right near the Mare Island Yard.

Mr. PADGETT. But the Mare Island Yard at present is not equipped for the larger ships, and they only pay here a charge that is fixed not to exceed the commercial rates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a provision that they may pay more than $50,000 a year.

Mr. PADGETT. If they do exceed the commercial rates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Senate passed a bill that it should not exceed $50,000 a year, and I think a provision should be put in here to that effect.

Mr. PADGETT. If we should limit it in that way and an emergency should arise, they could not expend more than $50,000 per year and they could not take care of the emergency.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A provision can be framed for all the dockage necessary at an expenditure of not to exceed $50,000 a year.

Mr. PADGETT. But if the dockage at commercial rates should amount to more than $50,000 a year——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It might be advantageous to make special rates for the Government.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, there was a provision in the House bill for the appointment of a commission to investigate the feasibility of erecting an armor plant. I know how the chairman expressed himself as being favorable to the proposition while in the House, and I would like to know if we can be permitted to have a vote on it.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know of any opposition to it. The committee reported a proposition of this kind, and I know of no opposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to delay the expeditious passage of this bill. I think we all desire to get away from here as soon as we can, but it is necessary to pass this bill before we go. As to the dock in San Francisco, I think if it was only the dockage charges of $50,000 a year, it would be a reasonable charge for the use of a great dock, because it probably costs from one to three million dollars to build a dry dock.

Mr. PADGETT. I think this one will cost not less than $2,000,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I desire to call the gentleman's attention to this fact. You dock a ship because it requires repairing, and if you dock it at a private yard the repairing will necessarily have to be done by the forces of the private corporation and take it away from the Government yards.

Mr. PADGETT. That is not contemplated. It is contemplated by the department to use the men at the Mare Island yard to do the work in the dock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How can that be done if the docking is to be done at a place not adjacent to the yard? How far is it from this dock to the Mare Island yard?

Mr. PADGETT. Twenty-eight miles. The men would go back and forth on the transports or tugs.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And you would have to remove the entire force and the machinery for the work?

Mr. PADGETT. Not the machinery. In the cleaning of the ship they would transport the men back and forth from the dock to the yard.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But you do not dock ships for the purpose only of cleaning off the barnacles, but you dock them for repairs as well. Will not that be considerably more expensive than if you provided for docking the ships in a Government yard?

Mr. PADGETT. If the department found that the repairs were of such a character that they could be done at the yards for less than it could at the dry dock, they would do it that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In the end would it not result that this provision, if it should be adopted, would carry the repairs of these ships into these private yards?

Mr. PADGETT. It might carry some into them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It seems to me that there ought to be a provision in the bill to provide against that.

Mr. PADGETT. This provision does not carry any obligation on the part of the Government to employ the men in these private yards.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know; but the natural result will be that, if the ship is docked in private yards, to have the repairing done by the private yard, and ultimately it will lead to extreme charges, which I think the conferees ought to guard against.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the past the private yards have been trying to do the repair work for Government vessels.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman would have no objection to the House discussing the provision before the conferees agree to it?

Mr. PADGETT. No; if it wants to.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it ought to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. One minute to interrogate the gentleman, if he will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. When the bill was before the House there was a question raised here as to the building of a dry dock at Pearl Harbor, and I desire to inquire whether that provision has been put back into the bill by the Senate?

Mr. PADGETT. It has.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has the gentleman any information further than what he had when the bill was before the House?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir. We went into it very fully then, and the hearings give very full information in regard to it, but I do not think the Senate has conducted any further hearings.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not desire to stop the gentleman's bill, but I hope before that proposition is agreed to I may have a chance to confer with him about it.

Mr. PADGETT. I would be very glad to do so.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, along the line suggested by the gentleman from Alabama, I desire to state that the dry dock can not in any event be considered an entity by itself. You can not drive a rivet without compressed air, you can not lift a propeller without an electric station on the ground, and hence a dry dock is part of a navy yard, and you have got to take all the rest in connection. Now, as to the $50,000, that is not required at all for the use of the dock, but we are only agreeing to patronize it to the extent of $50,000. We may patronize it to the extent of $1,000,000 a year, but we bind ourselves to patronize it to the extent of $50,000, and if the docking of two ships takes all the $50,000 then, of course, we will continue under the language of the bill without restriction.

Mr. PADGETT. There is no obligation to go beyond the $50,000, but there is an obligation to take that much.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. I understood the gentleman to state to the House that we had hearings before the Committee on Naval Affairs on this matter?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I said the hearings contain information about it, but there were no specific hearings other than what the Secretary stated about it, but there is a good deal of information in the hearings about it.

Mr. WITHERSPOON. The truth about the business is nobody has been before the Committee on Naval Affairs to tell us anything about the facts of this except the statement that the gentleman made of information given in the conference between the gentleman and Mr.——

Mr. PADGETT. I stated on the floor of the House and I want to say here there is a good deal of information, and it was commented upon when the bill was before the House.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Alabama suggests before the gentleman agrees to the Senate amendment he will give the House a chance to discuss the amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. As to what?

Mr. GARNER. As to the Pearl Harbor proposition.

Mr. PADGETT. I did not understand the gentleman from Alabama to say that. He said he wanted to speak to me personally about it.

Mr. GARNER. We want that agreement. I do not think it ought to be a conference only between as distinguished a gentleman as the leader of the majority and the chairman of the committee on a proposition that attracted so much attention at the time without the House having a chance to discuss the matter.

Mr. PADGETT. I have no objection, but I did not understand the gentleman to ask other than——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not go that far, but I want to give some further investigation to the matter, because I was not thoroughly satisfied and the gentleman stated he had no further information, and I desire to make some investigation myself.

Mr. PADGETT. All right, sir.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. PADGETT, Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, and Mr. BUTLER.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS ON LATE REPRESENTATIVE PEPPER.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a tribute on the late Congressman PEPPER. I will say I was not here on the day set apart, nor was I here within five days thereafter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a speech on the life, character, and public services of the late Representative PEPPER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17041.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, remarkable as it may seem, there is over $5,000,000 in the present bill under consideration, which carries more than $100,000,000 for various branches of the Government, which is expended without responsibility to any one of the executive departments of the Government. Because of this defect in the laws creating national soldiers' homes evils have arisen. Now, the few remarks I am going to make will be related to the expenditure of these $5,000,000; and before proceeding I want to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of a very remarkable letter from a member of one of these branches of the Soldiers' Home setting forth conditions which prevail, and I also ask unanimous consent for the publication of several extracts bearing on conditions there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the matter indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the complaints that have come to Congress in the last year from the several branches of the Soldiers' Home have grown to such an enormous number that I believe the time has come when Congress ought to take some action in relief of the situation that is there presented. I have received myself probably 1,000 letters from members of these homes concerning the conditions. The Committee on Military Affairs has in its archives hundreds, if not thousands, of letters bearing upon the same subject. The question is, What is the cause of the trouble? I can answer it in a very few words. It mainly arises from the fact that the men are not properly fed; and the situation can be explained in a very few words when I state to the committee that of the $5,000,000—or, rather, of the $4,000,000—which directly goes in this bill to the support of the 10 branches of the Soldiers' Home, 32 per cent of that enormous amount of money goes for the salaries of employees connected with those institutions, and only about 15 per cent for the subsistence or food of the 17,000 to 19,000 soldiers who are members of these homes.

The fact is, gentlemen, that the subsistence of these men is so stinted that they are not being fed in a manner consistent with their age and with the needs of a body of men like that. The figures show—and they will be found in the matter which I will introduce in the RECORD—that the average cost of a ration in the homes during the past year was about 22 cents per day per member; that is, in the volunteer homes, provision for which is made in the sundry civil bill. And I want you to compare that cost with the subsistence cost of a member of the home right here in Washington, the Regular Army Home, administered under the supervision of the War Department, where that department allows 35 cents a day for the subsistence of a veteran of the Regular Army who is cared for in that home. And, again, the parsimonious management of these Volunteer homes allows about 24 cents per day for the subsistence of a sick soldier in one of the Volunteer home hospitals, whereas in Washington, at the Regular Army Soldiers' Home, the cost runs about 44 cents a day. At the Fort Bayard (N. Mex.) Sanitarium for the soldiers of the Regular Army afflicted with tuberculosis they allow about 48 cents a day for subsistence. At the Battle Mountain Sanitarium the veteran Volunteer soldier who fought in the Civil War and the Spanish War—and all of them are suffering from tuberculosis—is maintained at the cost of about 24 cents a day. Now, that is the difference between good food and bad food—between, practically, starvation and feeding the men in a manner in which a veteran soldier should be subsisted—and those figures practically tell the whole story. There is undoubtedly plenty of rough food furnished in the Volunteer Homes, but the general opinion of those who know is that it is miserably cooked, and that there is not a sufficient variety suited for aged and invalid men. From a discussion of this matter with hundreds of the soldiers who are interested and with a number of the officers of the Army who have given the matter careful consideration, I arrived at the conclusion that the proper remedy was the transfer of the control of these 10 soldiers' homes from the present board of managers to the supervision of the War Department.

Right here in Washington, at the Regular Army Soldiers' Home, we have the spectacle of nearly a thousand soldiers living in absolute contentment. They are happy and well satisfied. In the 10 Volunteer Soldiers' Homes throughout the country we have nearly 19,000 men, half of whom are complaining of what the Government is giving them, and if you go among them you can see that they are unhappy; that they are discontented with their lot, and we are not doing what we can to make comfortable their last days on earth. In my visits to these Volunteer Homes they have impressed me as being conducted more in the nature of charitable or penal institutions than as homes of veteran soldiers of the greatest and most patriotic nation in the world. There is an air of oppression which pervades every one of them, and it only requires a visit or talk with the members to see that things are not as they should be.

I have offered the House in the nature of a bill, which I introduced some time ago, what I think is the remedy, and that is to transfer all these homes to the War Department. The Military Committee of the House took the bill under consideration. A subcommittee investigated it, probably not as thoroughly as it might have done had it had the time, but it went far enough to convince the committee that some necessity for action existed. And the Military Committee reported out a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HAIR], which authorizes a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs to make a proper investigation of these homes and to report to Congress on the conditions which exist and as to a proper remedy for the cure of any evil conditions. I am in hopes that this House may reach consideration of that resolution. It should be passed. We should give some relief to the hundreds and thousands of men who are asking for it, that we may do our part toward making their last days on earth comfortable at least.

The other branch of Congress has gone into this matter. Last year the Senate appointed a committee to investigate the California home. They have made a voluminous report of about 500 pages, every page of which bears out the statements I have made on the floor to-day. That committee recommended the discharge of a number of the officials of that home, including the governor. They found out that the charges made against the board were true and borne out by the facts. The facts in the Senate document alone are enough to warrant this House in going ahead and taking away control from the board in which these powers are now reposed and transfer them to the War Department.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I understood the gentleman to state that the Committee on Military Affairs has reported a resolution for the appointment of a committee to visit and inspect these several Volunteer homes. Do I understand that is a resolution that is expected to be passed through the House or is there such a subcommittee already appointed; and if so, does it intend to visit these homes?

Mr. ANTHONY. As I understand it, Mr. Chairman, Mr. O'HAIR'S resolution calls for the appointment by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of a subcommittee to investigate these charges relative to the soldiers' homes and report as to whether or not it is expedient to transfer the management.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Has the committee been appointed?

Mr. ANTHONY. The resolution has not yet passed the House. It is on the calendar.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the resolution is passed, it will provide that there will be a subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs clothed with jurisdiction to make a thorough investigation and personally visit some of these homes or all of them?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the idea, and to make a report recommending proper action in the case.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will my friend from Kansas yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. With pleasure.

Mr. GOULDEN. Do the charges which you have made on the floor here include any of the State homes?

Mr. ANTHONY. They do not. As a general rule, I think, the State homes are very well conducted. At least, I know in the State home in my own State there is no complaint whatever.

Mr. GOULDEN. I am glad to hear the gentleman say so. For 12 years I have been one of the managers of the New York State home at Bath, and I think it has been efficiently and honestly managed. We have had, it is true, an occasional complaint as to some particular class of food, but very rare, indeed, which was always promptly remedied to the satisfaction of its 2,000 members.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to tell the gentleman the reason why, to my mind, these State homes are well conducted and the national homes are not: The board of managers in these national homes maintains a sort of quasi military authority all through them. You will see under officials and the head officials running around, with brass buttons, epaulets, and uniforms, as if they were all major generals of the Army. They maintain the most rigid discipline in these homes, and feeble men, men who are dying, and go there to spend their last days on earth in a peaceful manner, are oppressed with this military, tyrannical atmosphere in these homes. That is the situation. In the State soldiers' homes there is an utter lack of that. They are real homes, not only in name but in fact. And in the Regular Army Home that is conducted by the War Department here in Washington, where you would expect to find brass buttons and military authority, there is an absence of both, and you do not see any of it about the place. If you go to the Volunteer homes, you will find that the reverse is true.

Mr. McKENZIE. How are these various appointees named in these institutions; by the board?

Mr. ANTHONY. The various appointees are supposed to be named by the board on the recommendation of the local governor, but I can say for the information of the gentleman that the board of managers has practically degenerated into a one-man board—Maj. Wadsworth, of New York, the president of the board.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does he have the power any time he feels disposed to appoint persons to manage those homes?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think he has. I will say for the information of the gentleman that this board a few years ago consisted of 10 or 11 members. Friction arose in the board. Some of the membership protested against the arbitrary use of power on the part of one of the members of the board, and from the resulting situation political manipulation was used right here in this body so as to reduce the membership on that board from 10 to 7 or 5, and so perpetuate the present head of the board in power. That is what we did in the last sundry civil bill—reduced the membership of the board in order to perpetuate the present management and to prevent a change in the head of the board.

Now, what happened this year? There were four vacancies on the board. An election came up in the latter part of April for the chairmanship of the board. The Committee on Military Affairs reported out a resolution filling those vacancies. That resolution is still on the House Calendar—kept there for the purpose of permitting the present head of the board to maintain his present ascendancy over the board. It is, in fact, a one-man board. One man, in fact, controls these 10 great Government institutions.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds I would like to ask him another question. I believe he has in his district one of the largest Volunteer homes that there is in the United States, and I presume the members of that home come from different parts of the country. They do not come entirely from the locality where the home is located. Is that true?

Mr. ANTHONY. They come from all over the country, as I understand.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he has had any complaints of members being expelled and becoming a charge upon the locality where the home is located, and if so, whether he has considered the advisability of making some provision by which such persons can be transported to the places from which they came and not be a public charge upon the county where the home is located?

Mr. ANTHONY. I am obliged to the gentleman for calling my attention to that matter, and I want to say this, for his information and that of the House, that the matters to which he alludes is one of the crying evils of the present system. At every one of these home poor unfortunate devils who transgress some minor regulation are deliberately thrown out upon the world to starve in midwinter, without a dollar in the world. Perhaps they may be addicted to the drink habit, or some other habit which they can not control, and thus they violate the regulations of the institution. They are decrepit. In many cases they are afflicted with disease and are utterly unable to care for themselves. But for a simple violation of one of these regulations the power is vested in the board or in the local governor to throw these men out on the street, as it were. A number of them have come to my office when I am at home, begging for money to keep them from starving to death. The county board maintains them; the local Grand Army posts maintain them; and the most pitiful spectacle is presented in the country adjacent to these soldiers' homes in the persons of these men who are discharged for the reasons I have given and thrown upon their own responsibility. I am not exaggerating when I say that many a man who is "given the gate," as they say, in this way, starves to death. A number of them do die every winter as a result of this harsh, cruel, and unusual punishment on helpless men.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Under any system, of course, you would have some who would be expelled. Now, ought there not to be some appropriation available to transport these expelled members to the places from which they come, so as to relieve the locality from having to support them, as I understand is the case?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman from South Dakota that, in my opinion, the proper remedy for the present situation would be the segregation of these unfortunate soldiers who can not control their habits—their segregation into one particular barrack or into one of the 10 homes, where the men can be taken care of, and not be thrown out onto the communities, or not be brought into contact with the other members of the homes.

I want to call your attention to the fact that those who may have committed a slight infraction of the rules of the home may have been in their day most excellent soldiers. If you were to talk with one of these men, as I have done, you might find that he may have been one of the finest soldiers in the world during the years he served in the Army. I have personally looked up the records of some of them and have found out that some of these unfortunate men were the bravest soldiers and had splendid records of war-time service; some of these heroes of dozens of battles; but they may have contracted bad habits, and now in their old age the Government throws them out, to make their own way among strangers.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Do I understand that the gentleman suggests that there should be a portion of the home set apart for these unfortunates, and that such a portion of the home should be conducted, in a sense, as a penal institution?

Mr. ANTHONY. I say the homes are now conducted as penal institutions, practically, instead of real homes for self-respecting veteran soldiers of the United States.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I would like to have the gentleman indicate how such members can be controlled under existing laws if they refuse to adapt themselves to the regulations? There is no way by which you can keep them in if they want to go out.

Mr. ANTHONY. They can be segregated into a barrack by themselves. There are perhaps 50 men of this kind in each of the homes. They could be segregated in a barrack by themselves. In many cases they are not mentally responsible. In many cases after the pension-money jag wears off these so-called delinquents would be amenable to kind, considerate treatment, if offered by the officials, and respond to it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Would they not resent that segregation?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, yes; they would; but I think that——

Mr. MADDEN. And would they not, in a sense, be placed on a roll of dishonor?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. Are not these men in receipt of pensions?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; most of them. They get their pensions every three months. A man of that class, when he gets his pension, spends it in a day, perhaps. Then he would starve.

Mr. MADDEN. Let us assume for a moment that the gentleman spends all his income in a day. What would happen to him?

Mr. ANTHONY. Oh, well, perhaps I would have the physical ability to go out and hustle for a loaf of bread.

Mr. MADDEN. But if the gentleman's habits were such that he could not control them, he would not have the physical ability to go out and hustle.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I would want to be treated just exactly as I would have the Government treat these unfortunate soldiers.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Is it not a fact that many of these men are over 70 years of age and many of them are 75?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is true.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Many of them are veterans of the Spanish-American War, their disability having occurred subsequent to their military service, and therefore they are not pensionable.

Mr. ANTHONY. A statement that I will put in the RECORD comes from a veteran of the Spanish War, now afflicted with tuberculosis. He was at the Battle Mountain Home, and he voluntarily left that home in order to save his life, as he put it.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the man in question was expelled, was he not?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I have taken the pains to get this man's record, and I find——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman give the name?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. The name is Wilford Davis.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I am not familiar with that name.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that a favorite method of the board of managers of defending themselves against attack, whenever a veteran makes complaint about one of these homes, is to reply with an attack upon the character of the soldier, in order to discredit what he says; but I have been very careful in the statement I will place in the RECORD to see that every soldier whom I have quoted in this statement has been honorably discharged from these homes and has a good record.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. What percentage of the total home membership would be included in the list of unfortunates that the gentleman has been describing?

Mr. ANTHONY. In my judgment, I should say probably 10 or 15 per cent of the total membership are unable to take care of themselves properly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think it is fair to arraign the management of the home because that 10 or 15 per cent are not allowed to run the home?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think I am entirely fair. I do not care how low in the scale of humanity one of these veteran soldiers may have sunk. I say if that man has become weak or unable to take care of himself, and has perhaps taken on vicious habits, it is all the more incumbent upon this Government to extend to him a helping hand, instead of kicking him out upon the street. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I entirely agree to that. I think the gentleman will agree, however, that there ought to be some restraining influence somewhere, by means of which the homes can be managed, and they can not be managed by people who are going to kick over the traces on every occasion.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the purpose for which we have the officials there, to manage the homes, and I know of no body of men anywhere who are more amenable to discipline and reason than the veteran soldiers in these homes.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Along the line suggested by the gentleman from Kansas, I want to state that I have had complaints about the Battle Mountain Sanitarium. I have in mind an old soldier who was thrown out of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, and who has now gone back to the State of Illinois and located in the State home at Quincy; a man who ought to have the kind of treatment that the Governnent affords to the inmates of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, but can not get it, because the governor of the home concludes he is not a fit person to be in that home.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman give us the name of the man?

Mr. FOSTER. I have the soldier's letter and can give his name to the gentleman.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] will permit me, I will state that there have been some complaints from the Battle Mountain Sanitarium. Three members were recently expelled from that institution, and they have made complaints to many Members of the House, and it was brought to the attention of the House by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] recently. I have received a statement from one or more officials of the home, and also from the president of the board, and under the five-minute rule I expect to bring it to the attention of the committee. I have not assumed to refute the charges and asked the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] with reference to a resolution that he stated had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs for the appointment of a subcommittee from that committee to investigate all of these homes. My desire is, and I think it is the desire of the management of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, that there may be such a committee, in order that there may be an investigation.

With reference to these members who were expelled, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] that they were expelled upon the report of a committee appointed by the commander of the National Spanish War Veterans' Association, who went to the home and made an investigation and recommended that these three particular members be expelled, and they were expelled. I understand that one of them has gone to his home in Illinois, and he may be the one to whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] refers. One of the others has also left Hot Springs and returned, I presume, to his home somewhere outside of South Dakota.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] will permit, I will say it is claimed that they expelled these men upon some report made by some official, without giving these men an opportunity to say a word as to whether these charges were true or untrue. They threw out these men and compelled them to go back to the States from which they came without giving them an opportunity to defend themselves and without giving them an opportunity to live where they might live in some sort of comfort and prolong their lives after serving their country, because, forsooth, they do not do as these officials think they ought to do. I think the greatest trouble with these men is that they are not lenient enough and not patient enough with those unfortunate people.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I do not wish the gentleman from Illinois to understand me as saying that there may not be cause for these complaints; but as to the three members whom I have in mind, they were dismissed from the home by order of the board of managers upon the report and recommendation of a committee appointed by the Spanish War Veterans' Association, and therefore the board of managers are responsible, and not the governor, for their dismissal or expulsion.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me give the gentleman from South Dakota a little information in reference to these three men to whom he refers. This purported investigation by the committee was, as I am informed, under the personal auspices of the board of managers. In other words, it was one of these personally escorted affairs.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman from Kansas is entirely correct about that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I know I am right, because I have a letter from one of that committee before the investigation severely denouncing the board, and one afterwards practically apologizing for the delinquencies he found, and a later letter from another one of the committee stating that certain Spanish War veterans who had been active in criticizing the board of managers had been offered positions in the home; and I have been personally solicited to vote for one of the members of that so-called commission to membership in the board of managers. That is the wheel within a wheel which there is there.

Now, in reference to the three poor devils who were "given the gate" at the Battle Mountain Home, the board does say that they were undesirable members of the home, and I have no doubt that in a way they were men who should be restrained; but I wrote to a man upon whom I can rely to find out just what sort of men these three were that were thrown out of the Battle Mountain Home. Their names were Wallack, Lacey, and Yount. Something about the harmless type of men these poor fellows are—all three invalids, in advanced stages of tuberculosis—appears in the letters which I will print in connection with my remarks.

This bill is the remedy:

A bill (H. R. 3409) to place the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers under the administration of the War Department.

Be it enacted, etc., That upon January 1, 1915, after the passage of this act, the powers heretofore vested in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall be vested in the Secretary of War, and the administration of the laws providing for the operation and regulation of said home shall be under the jurisdiction of the War Department. The Adjutant General, Inspector General, Quartermaster General, Commissary General, and Surgeon General, each, under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall perform such portion of the work of administration as shall appropriately fall to the respective bureaus of the War Department.

SEC. 2. That upon January 1, 1915, after the passage of this act, the terms of office of the various members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall cease, and all title to property and authority heretofore vested in said board shall pass to the Government of the United States.

SEC. 3. That such provisions of existing laws as are in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Pass this O'Hair resolution and get the facts:

House resolution 439.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives or a subcommittee thereof, be, and it is hereby, instructed to make full investigation of the conditions and affairs of the national homes for disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors, and particularly to determine the nature of the treatment given at the various branch homes to the members thereof, and with a view of determining whether or not it is for the advantage and best interests of said homes and the management and conduct thereof, that they should be by an act of Congress placed under the management and control of the Department of War, and to report the facts and their findings to the House; and that said committee shall be authorized to sit during the sessions of the House and during any recess of the House or Congress, and hold its sessions at such place or places as it shall deem most convenient for the purposes of such investigation; to employ stenographers and such competent accountants as it may deem necessary; to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths; and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

THE CONVINCING STATEMENT OF WILFORD W. DAVIS IN REFERENCE TO ADMINISTRATION AT BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM AND OTHER HOMES.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM,
NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
Hot Springs, S. Dak., December 30, 1913.

The Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I should be pleased if you would kindly allow me to bring to your attention an old subject, but probably in a new light. My attention has often been called to your attitude on the soldiers' home question, which, in my judgment, is very plausible.

But the incident which finally induced me to address you on this mooted question was a speech by the Hon. WILLIAM W. RUCKER, of Missouri, on the floor of Congress under date of December 12, 1913, and appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of same date, page 745. Mr. RUCKER said in part: "* * * I shall vote against any appropriation bill which proposes to tax the American people to pay pensions to millionaires or to people already protected and cared for by the Government in soldiers' homes. * * *"

The above is a fair idea of the understanding of the average citizen as to the sumptuous luxury of the wards of the Government in the soldiers' homes, which means that the old soldier is classed with millionaires in his luxurious protection. But in view of the fact that you have probably gone into the soldiers' home question pretty thoroughly, and in view of the further fact that there are in your district in Kansas both a soldiers' home and a Federal penitentiary, I am confident that you have the situation sized up far more accurately than has Mr. RUCKER. I may say in this connection that I have had an opportunity to go over a considerable volume of data on this subject, from which I have culled information that lay concealed under a maze of apparently harmless figures, and from these figures I have been able to deduce certain facts that did not appear at first sight from a perusal of annual reports, etc., of these homes; and I have also been an inmate of one of the homes. In view of this I believe I will be able to submit below some information which may enable you to more enthusiastically support your contentions in this connection than ever before. I have done this work with my own hands at such times as I felt able, much of it I have done while sitting propped up in bed, so please overlook any possible equivocal language which may appear here and there. But why multiply words? Let the facts be submitted to a candid world.

In the first place, I wish to call attention to a colloquy that took place between Maj. J. W. Wadsworth, president of the Board of Managers National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and Senator GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, in the course of the investigation of the Santa Monica Branch of the National Home. The following is taken from page 1197, Report 1167, Senate Calendar No. 1034, third session, Sixty-second Congress:

"Maj. WADSWORTH. Well, if it is not a happy existence (meaning that of the inmates of the soldiers' homes), God Almighty alone can make it so. The Government of the United States can not do any more for these men than it is doing. No Government in the world is doing anything like it. * * *

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. * * * Right in that connection, I think that we are willing to concede all that you say, but the trouble is not in what the Government is doing for them, but in the manner of administration. * * * A change must be made in the way in which the Government is having its bounty administered. Now, that is up to the board. That is where the trouble is."

The foregoing remark was made by Senator CHAMBERLAIN to Maj. Wadsworth after Senator CHAMBERLAIN has just finished an extensive investigation of conditions at the Santa Monica Home, and I leave it to Mr. ANTHONY'S good judgement as to whether Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S remark was very accurately and timely put. Now, in order to the more forcibly corroborate Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S remark, I wish to call attention to the following remarks with reference to the Pacific Branch (Santa Monica) of the Soldiers' Homes by Maj. J. W. Wadsworth, president board of managers, in his annual report to Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912 (p. 7):

* * * * * * *

"* * * The Pacific Branch has been under the close supervision of the manager residing in California and, on account of its remote location, has received especial attention by frequent visits of the inspecting officers. The president of the board has also visited and inspected this branch during the year, as well as all other branches. All of the branches have been regularly inspected by the inspecting officers of the home, and all irregularities and faulty conditions discovered have been corrected as promptly as possible."

* * * * * * *

In the same report, page 16, appears a draft of the annual report for fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, in which the president of the board of managers makes the following significant remarks, with reference to the magazine articles that were then being printed broadcast, touching upon conditions at the Santa Monica Branch:

* * * * * * *

"The affairs of the home have been administered in accordance with the law and the established regulations. The several branches of the home have been thoroughly inspected at various times during the year by the board of managers and the inspecting officers of the home. All irregularities and faulty conditions found have been corrected as promptly as possible. Notwithstanding the publication in one or more magazines of the muck-raking variety of untruthful and apparently malicious articles, relating to the home and its management, which were designed to encourage unrest among the members of the home and to arouse feelings of apprehension and anxiety in the minds of their friends and relatives, there has been no time in the history of the home when a higher degree of general contentment among the members of the home has prevailed."

* * * * * * *

Please note that the above encomiums as to the management of the homes, were included in the president of the board's annual report for fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, and which, according to the regulations, must have been compiled sometime during the month of August, 1912. Please carefully note the date. You will note that, from the board of managers' angle of vision, that things with the homes in general, Santa Monica and all, "were lovely and the water was fine." Now, please note that on August 19, 1912 (while the board of managers was compiling its annual report) that a resolution (No. 160) was introduced, and passed, in the Senate, directing an "investigation of the condition and affairs of the branch National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Santa Monica, Cal." The full text of the resolution will be found on page 3 of the investigating committee's report (S. Rept. No. 1167). The investigating committee began its work of taking testimony at Los Angeles, Cal., on November 19, 1912, just three months after the board of managers had made up its annual report. Now, the report of the investigating committee of the Senate comprises 1,243 pages—1,243 pages of the most illuminating information, setting forth just how things were, and had been, running at that home for years past. The report is too voluminous to be read in its entirety by a busy man, but permit me to call your attention to just a few of the things which were found to exist at Santa Monica just three short months after the president of the board of managers had said that he himself had inspected the Santa Monica Branch, and that "all irregularities and faulty conditions found had been corrected as promptly as possible."

The following extract is taken from the testimony of Maj. Wadsworth, president of the board, and found on pages 1135 to 1179 of the aforementioned report:

* * * * * * *

"Maj. WADSWORTH. The Pacific Branch is using 91 per cent of the Army ration. * * * The first quarter of the year in 1905 they were using 91 per cent. In 1906 they (meaning the Pacific Branch) were using 89 per cent of the Regular Army ration. In 1907 they were only using 82 per cent in the Pacific Branch. * * *

"Senator CARTON. How do you account for that variation in the quantity that would be served each year?

"Maj. WADSWORTH. It is caused by the commissary not attending properly to his duty. I should say, and seeing that it is all accurately weighed.

"Maj. HARRIS. It is the fault of the branch officers. That applies not only to coffee but to all other food supplies (p. 1135).

* * * * * * *

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. There is not one man in a hundred in that home, nor I venture to say in any of the homes, that knows anything about the rules and regulations. * * *

"Senator JONES. There did not seem to be any copy of these rules and regulations available. We could not find any copies in the different barracks where the members could get at them.

"Maj. HARRIS. There is a sufficient number issued to every branch, and they should have sufficient copies for everybody * * * and if they have not been distributed it is through neglect of the branch officers.

* * * * * * *

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know what we found in that home was a fair criterion, but I think it is true in every home that there is a lack of entente cordiale between the officers and the man. There is not that feeling between them that ought to exist.

"Maj. HARRIS. A feeling that you can not buy with money.

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; and when you find a man who has not got it in him naturally, he ought to be demoted (p. 1157).

* * * * * * *

"Maj. WADSWORTH. I can not understand it. The same rules and regulations govern that home as govern the other branches of the home.

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. I think we can understand it. It is simply not born in those particular officers at that particular home to come in touch with the men and to gain their good will.

"Senator JONES. They are not the right men for those positions.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. Well, I can not understand it (p. 1158).

* * * * * * *

"Maj. WADSWORTH. I came on the board about six years ago, and we found a very bad condition of affairs there [meaning Santa Monica], an incompetent and dishonest governor and an incompetent and dishonest quartermaster. I came back home and demanded their resignations, and I put in Cochrane. * * * The first two years Cochrane did very well, indeed * * * but for the last two and a half years or three years he has simply fallen down. * * *

"Senator CATRON. I think the administration there has been defective for a year. * * * We had testimony that they were not careful about matters, and that dirt, etc., would get into the food when they were cooking.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. You know there are lapses in those matters everywhere. * * *

"Senator CATRON. We can not be expected to suggest the entire remedy. You [meaning the board of managers] are the commission appointed to look after these things.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. Possibly a layman could see things that the officer can not.

"Senator JONES. It seems to me, from my observation there, that the difficulty largely grew out of the lack of apparent interest in the officers in seeing that matters under their control were properly carried on. That is, there were things about the kitchen there that apparently the commissary paid no attention to at all. He never came around and looked into things.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. We have been very weak in our commissary there.

"Senator JONES. That is not only true with regard to the commissary, but the other departments also, except the hospital (p. 1165).

* * * * * * *

"Senator CATRON. The greatest need there is to have officers who will keep in touch with the men?

"Maj. WADSWORTH. Yes; that is it (p. 1166).

* * * * * * *

"Senator CATRON. We found the governor [meaning Santa Monica] calling men up before him for the most ridiculous kind of charges. For instance, one man talking among the men, just happened, casually, to say: 'The governor has not got any sense.' Some one overheard him and he was called up before the governor. * * * The governor sentenced him to 40 days on the dump for disrespect to his commanding officer * * * and it struck me that that was an unnecessary punishment to put upon that man. * * * There were a great many instances there that bore in that same direction that he did not seem to think he had any discretion. * * * It was not only Cochrane but the whole administration; all the officers there seemed to agree with him that he was just right—that is, that the whole administration was right.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. Yes (p. 1166).

* * * * * * *

"Maj. WADSWORTH. We find sometimes accumulation of rubbish in the attic [meaning at regular inspections].

"Senator JONES. Of course you expect to find those conditions better when you are there, because the governor is given notice.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. That is so. * * *

"Maj. HARRIS. The regulation is that the commissary of subsistence shall look after these things [meaning variation of bill of fare].

"Maj. WADSWORTH. They did not tell you that they were tied down to that bill of fare, did they? * * *

"Senator CATRON. They called our attention to that bill of fare and said they were governed by it.* * *

"Maj. WADSWORTH. * * * There is the regulation.

"Senator CATRON. That is not what they said.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. The regulation also provides that the ration shall have suitable proportions of fish, cereals, bread, and fruit, and, the physical condition of the members being considered, coffee, tea, sugar, milk, and the usual table condiments will also be provided.

"Senator CATRON. They seemed to think that their discretion was to be exercised within the limits of the regulation prescribed.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. We do not prescribe any amount. * * * Yes; and the bill at that home until the appointment of Cochran was not satisfactory, and it was satisfactory for two or three years, and now it has not been satisfactory for two or three years; but we have run up against that old-soldier sentiment, and it was impossible to change it. I would have changed it if I had my own way. I am not criticizing them [meaning the rest of the board], because they are old soldiers and have the warmest sympathy for the old men." (P. 1172.)

* * * * * * *

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You were speaking of the extreme sympathy of the governors for those men [meaning the old soldiers]. Now, as good a man as I believed Cochran to be, the evidence of himself and all the others showed that he did not get around. Those old men would very rarely get into his sanctum sanctorum for the purpose of speaking about things they wanted. Now, if he has the right sympathy, the governor ought to go to the bedsides of those old men in the hospital and speak an encouraging word to them and they do not do it. He ought to do it whether he feels it or not.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. You can not expect them to do it.

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You were speaking of the intense sympathy that these old men [meaning the governors, etc.] have. They do not show it.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. I think they have as much as I have, and no man can have more than I have. * * *

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You take this chaplain out there; while I think he is not an intensely good man, yet the evidence showed that he did not pay any attention to the material welfare of those men, and very little to their spiritual welfare. He did not attend at the hospital, except to attend at the funeral of a man. I think he should have gone around to see them.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. I agree with you on that. Gen. Smith is a member of the board, and he will bear me out in saying that I have always insisted on having and tried hard to get men who had the physical vigor to attend to the needs of these old men.

"Senator JONES. The chaplain has the physical vigor.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. Yes. I thought Wilson was a good average chaplain.

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. If he is a sample of them, they do not need any.

* * * * * * *

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you ever adopted the rule of letting your governors understand that that [meaning personal visits to the men in barracks and hospitals] was required and expected of them, and if they did not come up to the mark you would relieve them? Do you not think that would have some effect?

"Maj. WADSWORTH. I never visit a home without impressing that upon the governor.

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The strongest way to impress it upon them is to let a fellow out once in a while.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. You can issue orders galore; how do you know that he complies with them?

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Let him out if he does not do it. Let them out once in a while; that is the best lecture.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. I could tell you why I could not let them out once in a while." (P. 1180.)

* * * * * * *

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. The evidence was undisputed out there [meaning at Santa Monica] on the part of the officers, that in order to have enough milk to go around they put in gallons of water.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. I saw that, too." (P. 1188.)

* * * * * * *

"Senator CATRON. That coffee at the Santa Monica Home was evidently drowned to death with water.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. That, of course, is not the allowance. The amount given here is what the homes actually consume.

"Senator CATRON. I understand that.

"Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You do not know how much water they consumed with it?

"Maj. WADSWORTH. There is no allowance on any single item of the ration.

"Senator CATRON. It may be that he would drink two or three times as much water [in his coffee] as the regular soldier to get that much coffee.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. If there was only that much coffee [meaning 19 pounds] in 100 gallons of water, that was not enough.

"Senator CATRON. That is what they put in.

"Maj. WADSWORTH. That is an unreasonable proposition and is purely a local fault, in not making the coffee as it should be made." (P. 1194.)

Now, after the Senate investigating committee had forced the foregoing damnable admissions from the president of the Board of Managers [Maj. Wadsworth] and the board's inspector, and just as soon as Maj. Wadsworth could recover his self-composure, he proceeded to deliver himself of the following, apparently in a wild endeavor to "whitewash" the whole thing. Here is what he said, in part (p. 1196):

"Maj. WADSWORTH. I would like to make a statement to go into the record, because I do not think that the Nation at large, or Congress, knows what we are doing for these old men. [Quite right, Major; we didn't know how you were treating these old men until after the Santa Monica investigation, but we do know now.—W. W. D.] * * * I believe, honestly, that 98 per cent or 99 per cent of the 17,000 or 18,000 old men are physically comfortable and mentally happy; as happy as men of that age, leading their idle lives, can be. The other 1 or 2 per cent are the men who, through overindulgence, have rendered themselves absolutely unable to enjoy old age [How about the many hundreds of respectable and sober old veterans who complained against your system at Santa Monica, Major?] or who are the chronic growlers or kickers you find in every walk of life. [The findings of the investigating committee do not bear you out, Major.—W. W. D.]

"What does the Government do for them? When a man comes to the home he is clothed from the top of his head to the bottom of his feet [with old, second-hand clothes, Major—W. W. D.], he is housed in a well-lighted, ventilated, and heated room [you mean he is herded in naked old barracks with a hundred other old men, Major—W. W. D.]. Those men sleep in a perfectly clean, comfortable bed [when the bedbugs are not too numerous, Major; see testimony of Santa Monica witnesses—W. W. D.]. * * * They have their bathrooms, waterclosets, and lavatories [65 old men to one bathtub, Major; see where diseased old men bathe in with the rest, in Santa Monica testimony, Major—W. W. D.]. They do not have to go out, as three-fourths of them used to [you mean 50 years ago, Major—W. W. D.], being farmers in the country, to a privy on a cold night [farmers now have lavatories in their houses, Major—W. W. D.]. They are even supplied with toilet paper [Major, toilet paper replaced corncobs on the farm 40 years ago—W. W. D.]. We give those men three wholesome, nutritious meals a day [Major, the "wholesome" meals you talk about cost you 6 cents apiece—composed of coffee, one-third strength, watered milk, badly baked bread, inferior cooking etc. Major, you said that the sheets on the beds of the old soldiers are changed just as they are in your own home. Now, are the meals anything like you have in your own home? Do you think you would be able to perform your duties as president of the board on 20 cents' worth of rations a day?—W. W. D.]. Best of all, when one of these poor old fellows falls ill, he knows that right there is a splendidly equipped hospital, where he will get the best of care. * * * When he dies he is put in a coffin fit for anybody, the American flag is put over him, and he is taken to the grave with the band leading the procession and a troop of mourners following [who furnishes the mourners, Major, the board of managers?—W. W. D.], and when he is put in the grave a stone monument is put at his head, and his grave is decorated with flowers on each Memorial Day. What more could the Government do for those men? [Major, the Government does its share, but do you do yours?—W. W. D.]

"Senator CATRON. I do not think they look at that latter performance very favorably" (p. 1197).

In justice to Maj. Wadsworth it might be proper for me to say in connection with the foregoing remarks by the major that the purchase of "whitewash" is authorized by the regulations of 1912; the exact paragraph in which it is authorized has slipped my memory for the time being. I may say that after the Santa Monica investigation the governor of that branch was discharged, along with several other officials of that home.

Next, in order, I wish to call attention to certain things in the annual report of the board of managers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912—I would use a later report, but the 1913 report has not yet been published.

According to the above-mentioned annual report, the average per diem cost of the ration for members was as follows:

Branch homes.

Central	$0.2032
Northwestern	$0.1992
Eastern	$0.2243
Southern	$0.2053
Western	$0.1945
Pacific	$0.2012
Mountain	$0.2051
Danville	$0.1936
Marion	$0.2144
Battle Mountain Sanitarium	$0.2125
Average	$0.2053
Total average members present for year 1912	18,977
Multiplied by average annual per capita cost	$74.9345
Making total annual cost of ration	$1,432,032

The following is a statement which was made up from the reports of the various branches as to the maintenance of farms:

Farm at—	Income.	Cost.	Net loss.
Central	$14,258.61	$27,762.79	$13,504.18
Northwestern	471.03	9,018.28	8,547.25
Eastern	11,547.86	20,257.43	8,709.57
Southern	108.29	9,864.66	9,756.37
Western	7,716.64	18,456.34	10,739.70
Pacific	7,967.64	15,780.83	7,813.19
Marion	11,126.61	13,481.58	2,364.97
Danville	1,153.01	10,730.13	9,577.12
Mountain	13,842.50	20,546.29	6,703.79
Battle Mountain Sanitarium	408.20	6,452.22	6,044.02
Total	68,600.39	152,350.55	83,760.16

In this connection I may say that according to the statement of Maj. Wadsworth, on page 1189, Santa Monica Soldiers' Home investigating committee's report, the care of the grounds about the homes is also charged up to the farm. As to whether or not this covers to some extent the losses incident to operating the farms is a matter of considerable speculation. A careful computation of the income and cost of the farm at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium shows that it costs each member of the institution $17.17 per annum for "scenery," this being the net loss per capita for operating the farm.

The following is an analysis of the amount paid for salaries during the fiscal year 1912. This I gathered only after a great deal of computation:

Salaries paid out.

Branch.	General expenses.	Commissioned officers.	Noncommissioned officers.	Members.	Civilians.	Total.
Central	$626,864.29	$23,358.07	$11,959.31	$68,394.82	$92,719.58	$196,431.78
Northwestern	350,812.67	19,594.34	6,041.33	40,060.82	53,845.76	119,542.25
Eastern	375,411.79	20,339.18	7,088.51	31,901.62	65,507.73	124,837.04
Southern	513,097.87	18,692.89	6,534.82	37,806.22	68,812.97	131,846.90
Western	467,391.61	20,012.46	7,202.16	38,983.83	79,342.87	145,541.32
Pacific	444,003.90	17,946.67	7,480.00	33,471.78	76,142.81	135,041.26
Marion	298,148.11	17,764.50	6,679.84	33,647.98	53,173.19	111,265.51
Danville	384,367.26	19,827.24	7,595.67	42,876.56	54,763.60	125,063.07
Mountain	300,412.98	17,483.59	4,615.34	28,905.10	61,778.28	112,782.31
Battle Mountain Sanitarium	173,655.11	11,099.70	755.49	8,789.47	43,324.24	63,968.90
Total	3,934,165.59	186,118.64	65,952.47	364,838.20	649,411.03	1,266,320.34

From the foregoing it will be seen that the total general expenditures for the various branches amounts to $3,934,165.59, and that the total amount paid out for salaries amounts to $1,266,320.34, which is exactly 32 per cent of the entire general expenditures of the various branch homes; in other words, $32 out of every $100 goes for salaries. This I ascertained only after dissecting a great many figures.

In table D, page 51, annual report of Board of Managers for fiscal year 1912, shows that $272,503.99 was covered into the United States Treasury, the same being unexpended balance for fiscal year 1912. This sum added to $1,432,032, which was the total cost of the ration for all the homes (see p. 10, this letter), would be $1,704,535.99. This sum might have been spent for rations, and had it been done it would have increased the average per diem cost of ration per capita from $0.2053 to $0.2461. On page 1206, Santa Monica investigating committee's report, is found Gen. E. A. Garlington's testimony with reference to the Regular Army ration, the ration for the United States Army Soldiers' Home, Washington, also the hospital ration there, which is as follows:

	Cents.
Regular Army ration per diem per capita	23.78
United States Army Soldiers' Home per diem per capita	34.75
Hospital United States Army Soldiers' Home per diem per capita	46.54

Annual report Board of Managers for National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shows as follows (see p. 10, this letter):

	Cents.
Average annual per diem cost of ration per capita	20.53
Average annual cost of ration per diem per capita at Battle Mountain Sanitarium, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers	21.25

The foregoing comparisons require no explanation; they speak for themselves, and speak very loudly for the men in the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. Gen. E. A. Garlington, Inspector General of the Army, sums up his testimony with reference to the ration for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, as follows (see p. 1207): "* * * From my study of the question, the principal trouble is in too much economy with respect to the rations," and everyone else, almost, is of the same opinion—with, of course, the exception of the administration of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

On page 1234, Sana Monica investigating committee's report, appears the findings of the expert accountant as to the methods for estimating for supplies, and he states, in part, as follows:

"I would recommend that a closer supervision be maintained over the handling of supplies. At the present time no close record of receipt and delivery of supplies is maintained and the supplies might be depleted through carelessness or intention, and it would be difficult to discover it.

"REYNOLD E. BLIGHT,
"Certified Public Accountant."

We come now to the local administration of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, here at Hot Springs, S. Dak. On page 196, annual report, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, fiscal year 1912, will be found report of Battle Mountain Sanitarium, in which it is stated that the average attendance for that year was 352, and that the per diem cost of the rations per capita was $0.2125; this means that the total amount expended for rations there was $26,329.60. Please note now, that while the hospital of the United States Army Soldiers' Home, Washington, spends 46.54 cents per diem per capita for rations, that this Battle Mountain Sanitarium (which is the hospital for the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers) spends only 21.25 cents, less than one-half as much as the United States Army Soldiers' Home hospital spends. On the same page of the annual report mentioned above will be noted that the Battle Mountain Sanitarium turned back to the general treasurer of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers $21,553.03, unexpended balance for fiscal year 1912. Had this sum been added to the $26,329.60 spent for rations, it would have swelled the amount to $47,882.63, and raised the per diem per capita ration allowance from 21.25 cents per diem per capita, to 37.54 cents. As nearly as I could ascertain from Maj. Wadsworth's testimony, the reason why the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers stubbornly adheres to the starvation ration allowance, is on account of "long established custom."

From the annual report above mentioned I ascertained, after considerable dissection of figures, that just 15 per cent of the money spent at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium was utilized for the purchase of the rations, while 30½ per cent, or $63,968.90, was spent for salaries, and that the net cost to each member for the maintenance of the farm was $17.17 per annum; this is the net loss for the operation of the farm which, according to the testimony of Maj. Wadsworth, is the amount expended for the maintenance of the grounds about the buildings.

I will note below something of what I have observed with my own eyes since I came to the Battle Mountain Sanitarium as a patient and leave it to your good judgment as to whether you think I am acting wisely in leaving the place to go out in the world penniless and rely upon the kindness and generosity of others for sustenance rather than put up with what one has to contend with here. The following remarks will, I think, give you a sufficient basis to form an opinion as to whether this institution is in just as bad a state of lethargy and procrastination as was Santa Monica Soldiers' Home when the Senate investigating committee went there, now about a year ago.

The first thing I encountered when I entered the door of this place was the astounding stupidity of the civilian employees. I went to the desk of the receiving clerk (or adjutant), and he looked over my application for admission, which clearly set forth my occupation at the time I entered the Army, which was that of stenographer. Attached to my application for admission were also several efficiency ratings which I had received while I was in the civil service, War Department. But notwithstanding this evidence this young fellow had the astounding and abysmal stupidity to calmly ask me if I could "read and write." He also asked me if I had utilized by Government transportation to this place, and I replied that I had; but I observed that he made no note of what I said. I went to the tubercular ward, which is some distance from the main building, and I was feeling very weak from my long trip by rail. I had not been in the ward long when I was summoned by an orderly to go up to the treasurer's office, thinking that I would be required to sign some papers, maybe, and that there was some reason for my appearance there in person. So I climbed a number of flights of stairs, up a hill, and into the main building; then up to the treasurer's office, and reached there completely exhausted.

And as soon as I entered I was again confronted with this question as to whether I had utilized my Government transportation. I was, to say the least, utterly exasperated. I replied that I had utilized my transportation, and told this callow youth in the Treasurer's office that I had already given the same information to the receiving clerk across the hall, to which he replied that that was none of his affair. Now, it occurred to me that if they had even a modicum of a system of checking up things there, that this receiving clerk could have noted about the transportation on my papers, and when the Treasurer's clerk came to check up the transportation he might, instead of dragging a poor sick man up before him, have simply stepped across the hall and secured the information from the receiving clerk, like any businesslike establishment would do. In case the receiving clerk didn't have this information, it seems to me that the Treasurer's clerk might have sent me down a memorandum by the orderly, with merely the question as to whether I had utilized my transportation, to which I could have easily added "yes," and that would have ended the matter in a businesslike manner. But not so with this administration here.

When I entered the ward to which I had been assigned I observed that the patients were protesting because they had not been issued any chewing and smoking tobacco for several weeks, as is provided for in paragraph 262 of the Soldiers' Home Blue Book. I believe they did get chewing tobacco, but am sure it was not smoking; but they showed the tobacco they had received to me, and it was all permeated with a greenish mildew. On October 20 last I observed that no smoking tobacco was issued—only chewing—and that the chewing tobacco that was issued was filled with this greenish mildew. Issue of smoking tobacco was resumed November 20, after having been out for more than a month. During the time no smoking tobacco was issued to the nonpensioner patients I was in the post store several times and observed that they had smoking tobacco for sale there, and it struck me rather curiously that an institution that was bound by the regulations to issue tobacco to its nonpensioner members was failing to do so, but was selling it.

The issue of smoking tobacco has relapsed again this month (December), and without one word of explanation as to why; they send around not one word of explanation, only leaving the patients to wonder at their failure to comply with the regulation. That there is a question as to the advisability of a sick man smoking or chewing a little, I will admit; but that for them to issue this mildewed chewing tobacco to a sick man there is, to my mind, absolutely no justification under the sun. Why, if I had a billy goat and he had no more self-respect than to chew this tobacco they issue here, I'd take him out and shoot him. The smoking tobacco was just about as bad as the chewing. It was this "Hugh Campbell's Shag," and when a man would light his pipe he would be thrown into a fit of coughing, since the tobacco was nothing but screenings and ground almost as fine as snuff and as rotten as cabbage leaves. I couldn't smoke it myself, and I heard the other patients saying they couldn't smoke it either, and they threw it away.

Between November 7 and the present date eggs, sirup, oranges, port wine, grape juice, apple butter, tomato ketchup, graham bread, and various other articles of diet have alternated in being "out" and no explanation as to why. I know two or three men who were depending upon eggs alone, almost, and when eggs would run out these men would naturally feel dissatisfied and wonder where the trouble lay. I might be more exact and name dates on which the various articles of diet and medicince are reported to be "out," but it would be too voluminous; I have the dates here, but will not insert them. From the foregoing it will be clearly seen, by reference to the Blue Book, that when these various articles of diet are allowed to run out it is a direct violation of paragraph 74, which says, in part: "* * * Strict economy will be observed in the preparation of food, without stinting the tables." Paragraph 604 makes ample provision for the purchase and issue of subsistence supplies. Paragraph 606 makes ample provision for "emergency requisitions." Paragraph 609 makes ample provision for the special diet of hospitals, and does not restrict the amount. Paragraph 57 makes ample provision for the surgeons in charge of hospitals to make timely requisitions for all supplies needed in hospitals, and paragraph 32 makes ample provision for the governor to make emergency purchases.

From the foregoing it will be clearly seen that the administration here is bound by no cast-iron regulations, which might impair the efficiency of their administration, so about the only excuse I can give for their failure to provide the things which the United States Government intends the members shall have is simply on account of official procrastination and stupidity and indifference as to their duties.

When I came here I heard the patients complaining about the excessive dust in the wards, and I observed that the ward men were sweeping up the bare floors without anything to keep down the dust. They finally induced the governor to send down some sawdust, which came in a few days—only about half a bushel. This soon ran out, and a barrel of shavings finally came down, but the ward men couldn't use them since they would stick to the floors like wet leaves. The governor's attention was called to this on or about November 15, and he promised to get some sawdust. Things rocked on for two or three weeks without any sawdust, and in the meantime the patients were protesting loudly at the excessive dust, which always irritates the lungs of a tubercular patient. On December 12 I importuned the governor to please get some sawdust, and four days later down came some coarse stuff which was unfit for any use to speak of. It took the governor just 31 days to replace the sawdust, and in the meantime my cough increased in violence until I began to run a high pulse and fever, but the governor was apparently as oblivious of his delinquencies as if he had been a child. The sawdust might have been secured from any of a number of sawmills all within a radius of 2 to 3 miles of this place, and the institution here has wagons and teams a plenty.

Then another instance of the governor's procrastination came very forcibly home to me in November and December of this year. I had a small tumor on my forehead, and on November 10 asked the governor to remove it; he replied that it could be done in a few moments, but without making any note of it passed on down the ward. A week later I again called it to his attention, and he said he was a little short of doctors, and for me to call it to his attention in another week, which I did, but this time he told me that he could do it the following Thursday, and when Thursday came around I reminded him of it as he had requested me to do, but he said that was a holiday and he couldn't do it that day, so he again passed along without even saying when he could do it.

A week later we had changed nurses in our ward and had a very efficient nurse, Mrs. Gilchrist, who called the tumor to the governor's attention, and he then finally said he would remove it that afternoon, which he did, after nearly 30 days' of begging on my part, and after he had had the matter brought to his attention five times. I submit that when a patient brings a thing to the doctor's attention and the doctor says it is expedient that the operation be performed, that from that moment the responsibility for the operation passes from patient to doctor. But to impose upon a patient the necessity of reminding a doctor of his duty time and again is, in my judgment, very poor professional ethics on the part of the doctor.

After the operation had been performed, about five days, I went to one of the internes, Dr. Crane, who pulled the dressing off the wound, leaving the vicinity of the wound covered with dried blood and the wound itself still raw, but notwithstanding this, Dr. Crane told me to go back to the ward and wash the wound off with warm water; this right in the face of the fact that the wound was still raw, and in the face of the fact that I am suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis and would in all likelihood run a great risk of infecting the wound. This, too, in my judgment, is an indication on the part of Dr. Crane of very poor professional ethics, and shows a spirit of indifference and procrastination. You may rest assured that I did not do as Dr. Crane told me, but left the wound entirely alone until it had healed sufficiently to prevent the possibility of infection.

I would like, also, to call attention to certain very grave derelictions of duty on the part of a Miss Turner, the nurse who preceded Mrs. Gilichrist in this ward. I observed that this nurse seemed to take pulse and respiration simultaneously, and then for only 15 seconds. I heard Mr. Frank H. Henderson and Mr. P. E. Holman, patients, say that they had held their breath while the nurse was supposed to take their respiration, and they said that they observed that she put down respiration just the same, and this of course aroused my suspicion, and I decided to give her a tryout, so I carefully observed her the next morning, and the instant she reached my side I withheld my breath, and during the 15 seconds that she held my pulse I breathed just once, and as she turned to write it down I observed that in addition to writing down my pulse she also put down "24" as my respiration, and I immediately reminded her of it, and told her I had held my breath, and she seemed a trifle confused a moment, then said I oughtn't to do that. That she was taking respiration by actual guess instead of by actual count, is absolutely beyond peradventure.

We have rest hour twice a day here, or are supposed to have, but this nurse would tramp through the ward right in the midst of the rest hour, when patients were trying to doze, and do so with the reckless abandon of a schoolboy. One day I asked her to refill my atomizer receptacle with oil, but instead of putting oil in it she brought it back to me with carbolic acid in it. As it happened the carbolic was weak and didn't burn my nose much when I tested it. On another occasion I saw her give P. E. Holman his daily medicine, and as he swallowed it he exclaimed that it was awfully bitter and tasted unusually queer; whereupon she said she had given him the wrong kind and went and refilled his glass with the proper kind, brought it back, and told him to take it on top of the other; that "it wouldn't hurt him"; and she did this with the most absolute diffidence imaginable. This nurse was a constant source of irritation to all the patients on this side of the ward and no one had any confidence in her to speak of. I wouldn't take another dose of medicine from that nurse for $500, not unless I was contemplating suicide; and I don't think you would blame me, either.

Another thing which is a source of great annoyance to the patients in the tubercular ward is the fact that from 12 to 15 men are required to be crowded up in one small 16-foot room; that is, it wouldn't square any more than that. According to the best medical authorities, a patient in a hospital should have at least 3,000 cubic feet of fresh air per hour. Now this room contains only 2,400 cubic feet of air space, and it would be just about enough for one man, with a change of air once an hour; but to force 12 to 15 men to lounge in it would require that the air should change about fifteen times an hour, or once every four minutes. Now, on cold days and nights in the winter, with the temperature about zero outside, it is an absolute impossibility to get even half enough fresh air or one-fifth enough fresh air. The patients usually congregate in the room for a couple of hours after meals to smoke or read, for the room is used as a cloakroom, as all their clothes are kept in it in lockers, and as a lounging room and recreation room. I find it oppressive to remain in the room when there are more than three or four men in it. I submit that any doctor who will silently stand by and allow a crowd of consumptives to be cooped up in such a "Black Hole of Calcutta" hasn't any more humane feelings than a fence post. Yet this goes on from month to month, and the governor knows it, and knows it is inadequate, but he is as indifferent to it as an infant.

Another thing I have thoroughly verified, and that is the utter carelessness of the doctors in making their morning rounds of this ward. The governor himself visited this ward for about six weeks, and I observed that he went through it very quickly. So one day I concealed my watch under the cover of my bed, and timed him from the moment he entered the building till he left. I did this for about a week. I found that it took him just about eight seconds to enter the chart room and get into the ward. This made it utterly impossible for him to examine the temperature, pulse, respiration, and weight records, which are supposed to be made up for the doctor to examine each morning before he passes through a ward or to be carried along with him as he visits each patient. But he ignored these charts and passed immediately into the wards and down the line, and, on an average, he spent 5 to 10 seconds to the patient. I was running a high pulse and temperature during the latter days of the governor's visits, but he never once said a word about it, but would pass me and, as he did so, stare down at me with a meaningless expression on his face, just as if he were viewing an Egyptian mummy. He hurried past his patients, whose lungs were in all sorts of decay, from incipiency to tertiary stages, and he never, never once offered to examine a man unless the poor fellow begged him to, and then, as a rule, he would put the man off two or three times. Mr. P. E. Holman, to my knowledge, kept at him for several weeks for an examination, but to date he swears he hasn't been examined. I was given a hasty examination when I entered, but haven't been examined since, except once or twice I asked the governor to sound my chest, and then it was but for a moment.

But "we have with us" now Dr. Milligan, late of Santa Monica, and from his actions he doesn't seem to have profited in the least by the terrible shaking up they got out there a year ago, although he was there at the time, so the records show. The nurse tried to tell him, a morning or so after he was assigned to our ward, that I was running an unusually high pulse and temperature, and she told him just as he was reaching my bedside, but he paid absolutely no more attention to her than if she hadn't spoken to him. Yesterday morning he again came through the ward and passed by me without stopping at all, so as he came back on his way out of the ward I asked him if he had examined my temperature and pulse chart for the past 24 hours, and he replied that he had not; then the nurse told him that I had a temperature of over a hundred and high pulse. Right there he admitted that he was neglecting his duty; he admitted that he did not examine the charts before going through the wards.

If the charts are not kept for the purpose of enlightening the doctor as to the patients' condition, I wonder what they are for. He spends even less time in the wards than did the governor. Dr. Milligan has now ceased making his afternoon rounds altogether, except to come to the dining room at supper time to see about the meals now and then. He is a source of constant irritation to the patients because of his professional lethargy; they see it; they see he hasn't the slightest regard for the psychotherapy (popularly known as the "mental attitude") element in the treatment of tuberculosis. That sick men are apt to be restive and impassive now and then is to be expected, but if Dr. Milligan or the governor has ever manifested the slightest personal interest in the men I have never been able to detect it. Another thing, we have a chaplain here, but only in name, and most certainly not in deeds, for he hasn't been in this ward since I came here—now nearly three months—and patients who have been here nearly a year say that they have never seen the chaplain in the wards. This is strictly in violation of paragraph 82 of the bluebook, which requires that chaplains shall make frequent visits to the hospitals. No notice of a service has ever been published in these wards in this building; nor do we ever see a bulletin board; nor are we furnished with a copy of all orders, and also the Blue Book, as required by the Blue Book.

That the governor is arbitrary in his administration goes without saying. He tries to force the sick men to line up with their coats on when he makes his morning rounds; that is, if they are in the recreation room, where it is close and stuffy and where a man should never wear his coat unless he wants to contract a death of cold the moment he goes out of it. That the governor is arbitrary and unreasonable in refusing to allow the nurses and other help to ever be seen in the company of men—it matters not whether on the grounds or off—goes without saying, and I hear them protesting loudly about it. It makes the nurses dissatisfied and tends to make them indifferent.

I have found that there is neither entente cordiale nor esprit de corps among the officials of this home; that they haven't any more respect or consideration for the feelings of the members than if they were inanimate, mechanical devices. That the employees—I mean the clerical contingent—are snobbish I am thoroughly convinced of. I was in the Federal civil service seven years, and if I am any judge of men at all I must say unhesitatingly that the clerks here couldn't hold jobs as messengers in the classified civil service.

Now, in view of the foregoing you will no doubt see the wisdom in it when I say that unless a man is drawing at least a small pension when he is in these national homes, God help him. Use this for any purpose you may see fit.

Yours, very truly,

WILFORD W. DAVIS,
Late Private, Troop M, First United States Cavalry, and
Ex-Civil Service Clerk, War Department.

DAVIS LEAVES BATTLE MOUNTAIN HOME.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM,
Hot Springs, S. Dak., December 30, 1913.

The Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am inclosing a copy of my application to the governor of this institution for my discharge, and am leaving this date for Denver, Colo., where I intend to enter a charitable institution. This application for discharge is self-explanatory.

In this connection please refer to my letter of even date setting forth conditions here.

Now, Mr. ANTHONY, if you would like to find out how lovely and efficient things are here at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, just call on the Board of Managers, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, 346 Broadway, New York, N. Y., for an investigation; but if you wish to know how superbly inefficient, how astoundingly incompetent, how abysmally indifferent this administration really is, just send a congressional investigating committee out here.

My future post-office address will be Wilford W. Davis, Denver, Colo., care of general delivery.

Yours, very truly,

WILFORD W. DAVIS,
Late Private, Troop M, First United States Cavalry, and
Ex-Civil Service Clerk, War Department.

T. B. COTTAGE, December 29, 1913.

The GOVERNOR AND SURGEON,
Battle Mountain Sanitarium.

DEAR SIR: I should be pleased if you would please grant me my discharge, and have the papers ready in order that I may leave on the Burlington train at 5.55 p. m., Tuesday, the 30th instant.

As to my reasons for desiring to leave, you will find them upon examination of my chart, which shows that I have been steadily declining now for more than a month. This place does not agree with me, and unless I go elsewhere at once I shall not be able to leave at all.

I am a poor man, without a cent on earth, and am in debt, and have no pension or income of any kind whatever, and will be entirely dependent upon the kindness and generosity of others for my maintenance on the outside; yet I had rather face these conditions than to imperil my life by remaining here.

Yours, very respectfully,

WILFORD W. DAVIS.

ADAMS MEMORIAL HOME,
Denver, Colo., April 11, 1914.

The Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of inquiry with reference to the Battle Mountain Sanitarium has just been received. Your suggestion as to the methods of the Board of Managers in combating complaints against the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers is more than true, but I am happy to assure you that in the present instance these tactics will be absolutely of no avail to them. I learned of these methods soon after I entered the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, and I therefore took the greatest of care to see that I gave them not the slighest excuse for any recriminations against me in this particular. No charges were ever preferred against me, either in writing or orally. My relations with them were courteous and polite. My first break with them was when I mailed you my report of December 30, 1913, the day I left the place. They know that I reported conditions to you, and this constitutes every syllable of differences I have had with them. There was no malingering, no infractions of rules in any way whatsoever, during my stay with them. I am inclosing you my discharge certificate from Battle Mountain Sanitarium, which is self-explanatory.

As further proof of my reliability I am also inclosing my discharge certificate from the United States Army, which shows that my Army record was above reproach in any way. I am inclosing a letter written by the adjutant general, Philippines division, Manila, April 30, 1904, confirming my appointment to the classified civil service of the Quartermaster's Department, and with this I have attached two of my efficiency ratings, showing my standing in the civil service after my return to the United States and while on duty at the depot quartermaster's office, Jeffersonville, Ind., which was just before my resignation from the civil service. For a full record of my connection with the civil service I refer you to the records of the Quartermaster General's Office there in Washington between 1904 and 1909. I also refer you to Dr. William S. Washburn, member of the United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, who is a personal friend of mine and whom I knew for five or six years while he was chief of the Philippine civil service, Manila.

There will probably be a political aspect to this matter before it is settled, which you will instantly recognize the moment you look at the front page of the inclosed menu of Battle Mountain Sanitarium, which bears the picture of the Hon. E. W. MARTIN, of South Dakota, who, it appears, is quite a friend of the present governor of the sanitarium, James A. Mattison, and who will probably put up a fight for Mattison. Mr. MARTIN has a nephew employed as adjutant at the sanitarium, and this nephew is the fellow whom I criticized quite severely in my report to you for his "abysmal stupidity." I am merely bringing this to your attention, so that you may know what to anticipate when the fight comes up on the floor of the House.

In conclusion, I may say that since writing my report to you of December 30 I have in not one single instance found that any statement I made was without good and sufficient foundation, and that subsequent incidents at Battle Mountain Sanitarium have only confirmed its truthfulness. The nurse whom I called attention to as being remiss in her duties, etc., was discharged as soon as it was known that I had reported her to you.

Any further information which you may desire in this connection will be cheerfully furnished, if within my power. I would have been more explicit and more thorough in my reports to you but for the fact that I have been too ill to leave my room

I should be pleased if you would kindly return the inclosures herein as soon as they are no longer required. Thanking you for your interest in this gigantic problem, and again assuring you of the merits of the case, I remain, Yours, very truly, WILFORD W. DAVIS.

P. S.—It will be noted that in my report to you I signed myself as "Ex-Pvt., Tr. M, 1st U. S. Cav.," while my Army discharge and that of the sanitarium show "Pvt. Unassigned 12th Cav." This is due to the fact that a few weeks before my discharge from the Army I was transferred from Troop M, First United States Cavalry, to Unassigned Twelfth Cavalry. W. W. D.

AN HONORABLE DISCHARGE.

A most reprehensible method of defense on the part of home officials, when the homes are criticized by members, is to attack the character or record of the soldier making the complaint. The following honorable discharge of Wilford W. Davis is therefore printed as a part of this record:

To all whom it may concern:

Know ye, that Wilford W. Davis, late private, unassigned company, Twelfth Regiment United States Cavalry, a member of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, who was admitted on the 15th day of October, 1913, is hereby honorably discharged, by reason of his own request. No objection to his readmission is known to exist.

Said Wilford W. Davis was born in Alabama, is 33 years of age, 5 feet 11¼ inches high, fair complexion, blue eyes, dark brown hair, and by occupation, when admitted, a stenographer.

Given at Battle Mountain Sanitarium Branch, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, this 30th day of December, 1913.

JAMES A. MATTISON,
Governor and Surgeon.

RELATIVE TO A REPORTED INVESTIGATION OF SOLDIERS' HOME CONDITIONS BY A COMMITTEE OF SPANISH WAR VETERANS, SUPPOSEDLY INSTIGATED AND FATHERED BY SOLDIERS' HOME OFFICIALS.

ADAMS MEMORIAL HOME,
Denver, Colo., April 18, 1914.

Hon. D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ANTHONY: I have just received your letter of the 14th instant with reference to the report of Mr. Frank F. Jones regarding Battle Mountain Sanitarium, in which he states that my letter to you of December 30 is "one tissue of false charges."

It would appear to an outsider that a very grave "blunder" had been made by Mr. Jones and Maj. Wadsworth in linking me up with three men who had not the slightest connection with me or my report. But to one who is familiar with the inside workings of this matter it is palpably evident that these gentlemen are striking at me over the shoulders of three men who may have been unfortunate enough to fall within the grasp of these said gentlemen. This, it appears, was done in the absence of any charges these gentlemen might lodge against me personally.

You asked me for a statement as to what I know about Walick, Lacey, and Yount, the three men who have recently been given the "gate" at Battle Mountain—for criticizing the management. I am personally acquainted with each of them.

Walick: A frail chap, in the secondary stages of pulmonary tuberculosis. Inclined to be fanciful as to his surroundings. Reads socialistic literature, but I never heard him voice a single sentiment in favor of "direct-action" tactics, such as is the wont of the I. W. W.'s. I am most certain he is entirely harmless, and am sure that the fellow would never knowingly insult a decent woman much less assault a respectably built athlete like the governor of Battle Mountain Sanitarium. I never knew of this fellow's taking a drink while I was at Battle Mountain.

Lacey: The remains of a once healthy Irishman, but now in the advanced stages of pulmonary tuberculosis and unable to lick a postage stamp without stopping to get his breath. Never drinks: i. e., never saw him under the influence of liquor. Has a well educated wife, who was an instructor in foreign languages in New York high schools. Lacey himself was, until he became ill, chief electrician for the New York World, World Building, New York, at a salary of $175 per month; showed me documentary evidence to prove this. Quite restive and impassive at times. One day when this Miss Turner—the nurse who I reported on page 19 of my letter to you—came in and gave him a medicine glass of clear water, having, as she said, forgotten to put the nux vomica in it, I heard Lacey say "damn." As the nurse walked away

Lacey brought the glass to my bedside and I tasted its contents, and it was pure H_2O. Presently she returned with the concoction the doctor had ordered. Probably Lacey should only have said "darn." What would you have said under the circumstances? I warned Lacey that some day the governor would hold this over his head. I can not support Lacey in what he said; I am merely pleading "aggravating circumstances." This was the nurse whose services were dispensed with when it was learned that I had reported her to you. Never heard Lacey threaten the governor's life, or anybody else's life, nor talk of "destroying the place by fire." This fellow is inclined toward socialism, but I have often heard him denounce the I. W. W.'s.

Yount: An easy-going, uneducated chap, in the advanced stages of pulmonary tuberculosis, but able to get about some yet. Was told that he got drunk Christmas, at any rate the contour of his face after he had been beaten up indicated such, and he admitted as much to me, then promptly went up to the governor's office and apologized. I saw him go to the governor's office, but only had his word for what he told the governor. This fellow is another helpless, harmless consumptive. Never heard him insult a nurse, nor make any threats.

In a word, these three men are simply three miserable, wretched, nonpensioned, impoverished invalids, with a rather exaggerated idea of their surroundings. They may have said what Jones reports they said, I don't know for sure; but I am constrained to the opinion that they were weak enough to succumb to the temptation to express themselves too freely in the presence of careless nurses and indifferent doctors. These three men probably suffering more from violation of conventionalities than on account of any profanity or malice which has been attributed to them. You know how soldiers will sit 'round the barrack room and indulge in idle remarks about people from the President down to the humblest private in the rear ranks. I have it very accurately that the governor had a man or two in the ward with these men for the purpose of reporting any remarks they might make which would incriminate them in any way. If these men have been guilty of violation of either the letter or spirit of politeness or of rules and regulations, I think you'll find a precedent for it in the carelessness of nurses, procrastination of doctors, as outlined to you in my letter of December 30. You will no doubt recall the disorder that used to exist in the schoolroom when you were a boy, when you had a weak schoolmaster—the big, bad boys throwing paper wads, pulling the girls' hair, banging one another over the head with books, etc. Well, in my judgment, Battle Mountain Sanitarium is nothing more than a replica of just such a state of things. When the trustees would haul the teacher up for not preserving order, he would promptly conceal himself behind the behavior of certain noisy pupils, etc. Well, this is just what James A. Mattison and James W. Wadsworth are now doing in Washington with regard to the soldiers' homes.

Last week a patient, who left Battle Mountain Sanitarium a week or two ago, came to Denver and out to my room and told me of this "investigation" and how it was conducted. This is merely reported to you in connection with what you stated about this investigation. This fellow told me that there appeared to be the greatest felicity between this fellow Frank F. Jones and the representatives of the board of managers that were with him. That they went arm in arm through the place and went through the wards and challenged each patient with, "Well, what have you got to kick about?" And if the man offered to say anything in the way of a complaint, Jones and the others would say, "Another kicker." He further stated that they held hearings behind closed doors in the chapel or picture show room. That they only let in one man at a time, and when through with him let him out, and call in another one, never allowing any spectators inside—nobody being inside but the committee and the man they happened to be questioning. That this fellow Jones was apparently the guest of the board of managers and was partaking of their courtesies and hospitality—and cigars.

With reference to how they investigated my report to you: When I left Battle Mountain I left two copies of my report with some of the fellows, and told them that I didn't expect to live long enough to see anything come of my report, since I was sinking very rapidly and did not expect to live more than a few weeks after I came to Denver. So I told them that if anything came up at Battle Mountain before the report was taken up in Washington that they might use it there, so I suppose some of them presented it before the investigating committee. But the committee nor anybody else ever communicated with me about it. I hope you may be able to find out whether these men—Walick, Lacey, and Yount—testified before the committee that my report was true. If they did support it, I leave it to your imagination as to the underlying cause of their getting the "gate."

Now, Mr. ANTHONY, investigations and court-martial proceedings are not new to me. Permit a moment's personal reference. I was in the Philippines when the famous "water-cure" cases were being tried and assisted in taking a great deal of the testimony. I was connected with the undertakings of courts of inquiry. I assisted in getting up the famous "Quartermaster Shop" cases, when graft was so thick that you could cut it with a butter knife. I've seen graft and grafters, crooks and crooked work, lies and liars. I have observed the tactics of all sorts of miscreants, both on the witness stand and off. And during my long connection with the Government service, coming in contact with a great deal of this sort of thing in investigations and trials, I may say that it has tended to develop a sort of sixth sense along this line. I've seen visionaries on the stand, taken their testimony; I've seen false charges run to earth, and have seen serious charges substantiated. And permit me to say that, in view of the foregoing, Mr. ANTHONY, I feel that my sense of perception, discrimination between the true and the false, has been sufficiently developed in the past to enable me to see a little deeper into things like the Battle Mountain incident than the average patient there. I have helped compile figures and statistics in cases like this before, and this, in addition to the experience cited above, leads me to reiterate with renewed emphasis every last syllable of my report to you of December 30, 1913. I have reached P. E. Holman by long-distance telephone, and he will be here to-morrow to make a sworn statement, supporting my report to you of December 30. He has offered to do it. The Mrs. Gilchrist, the very efficient nurse mentioned on page 19 of my report, was handed carbon copy of it, and she states it is true in every particular. She is in Denver, having resigned from Battle Mountain Sanitarium because of the unsatisfactory manner in which they were running things up there, so she says. Mr Holman will see her to-morrow as soon as he gets here and get her statement. I will have Mr. Holman bring a notary here to my room, and I will swear to my statement to you of December 30, carbon (facsimile) copy of which I have here with me. These three sworn statements will be attached to this carbon copy, and all three of us will swear as to the truthfulness of the report and make the report a part of our sworn statements. This done, I shall have it mailed to you Monday afternoon by special delivery, so that you may get it in Washington at the earliest possible moment. We have no Soldiers' Home money with which to defray traveling expenses, etc., like Maj. Wadsworth has, so please pardon our meager showing for promptness and our inability to come to Washington and lobby around, as Maj. Wadsworth appears to be doing.

In closing I should esteem it a great favor if you would kindly give me the address of this Frank F. Jones and ascertain what camp of the Spanish-American War Veterans he hails from, as I have a friend here who is in a position to ascertain whether this man Jones is acting in good faith with the veterans; and if not, I think maybe Mr. Jones will have a chance to either explain himself or accept employment with the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers. Imagine a judge of a court convicting or acquitting a man after the man had testified both for and against himself, and after the judge had been felicitating with him, partaking of his hospitality, and smoking his cigars. This is indeed one of the strangest anomalies of these internal investigations conducted of the Board of Managers, by the Board of Managers, for the Board of Managers.

Yours, very truly,

WILFORD W. DAVIS.

The Hon. DANIEL R. ANTHONY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your kind letter of January 7, acknowledging receipt of mine of December 30, was received some time since. I am willing to admit that the subject upon which I addressed you—National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers—is about as stale as the hackneyed "Philippine question" used to be, but at the same time I and a large number of my friends have been and are at the present time vitally interested in both of these old questions. Our participation in the solution of the Philippine unpleasantness unfortunately forced a lot of us into the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers later.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ANTHONY, if you only knew how the fellows are howling for the relief as proposed in your bill, I am sure you would just scratch up the grass around the Capitol in an endeavor to get your bill through. The despicably rotten conditions prevailing in some of these homes is enough to drive a man to the brink, if not to drink. I am inclosing copy of a letter I recently addressed to the governor and surgeon of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, which is self-explanatory. You will observe that I became a trifle facetious in this letter, but I felt that the exceptionally disgusting circumstances warranted me in departing to some extent from the straight and narrow path of conventional formalities. I have virtually bantered the governor of the Battle Mountain Sanitarium to holler for an investigation in order to exonerate himself, but he is afraid of an investigation, so far as I am able to judge, for he knows that if an investigating committee were to wait upon him that he would get fired, just as the erstwhile Cochrane was fired from the Santa Monica Soldiers' Home about a year ago. Trusting that I may be favored with good news from you in reply, I remain,

WILFORD W. DAVIS.

ADAMS MEMORIAL HOME,
Denver, Colo., January 20, 1914.

Col. JAMES A. MATTISON,
Battle Mountain Sanitarium, Hot Springs, S. Dak.

DEAR SIR: You will probably not be able to recall me personally, but your records will, in all probability, show that I was an inmate of Battle Mountain Sanitarium from October 15 to December 30, 1913.

I had intended to address a few remarks to you at the time I left, but as I was suffering from a relapse and as I had been devoting my comfortable moments to a report, setting forth a few of the irregularities of Battle Mountain Sanitarium, to a Member of the House of Representatives, I was unable to write to you.

One would naturally expect that an ex-patient would write his doctor in appreciation of the treatment he had received; at any rate circumstances ought to warrant a patient in so doing. But I regret exceedingly that the present circumstances do not justify me in extending my appreciation. I would have written this earlier, but the "treatment" I got at Battle Mountain was such as to put me in bed, and I have been in bed ever since I left there, with the exception of the last two or three days.

If you wish to gain some idea of my opinion of the "treatment" I got while at Battle Mountain Sanitarium, and under your jurisdiction (I shall not say "care"), just read the coming issues of a little paper entitled "The Westgate News." I think you will find copies of this paper in circulation around your institution, and I think Capt. Milligan will be able to gather one up for your perusal. While the compositors may get a few of my figures a little twisted, still at the same time you will find the facts standing there in stately alignment, just like the ancient columns in front of the old Hall of Karnark.

But in addition to what may appear in the above-mentioned publication there are two or three other little matters which I should be pleased to bring to your attention. It is usual with me to indulge in nothing but the choicest of elegant expression, and I try to be guided by the rules laid down by the acknowledged masters of English diction. But I must confess that there is a time when patience ceases to be a virtue, and also it occasionally happens that one must express himself in such terms as may be thoroughly comprehended by his readers or his audience, and on such occasions it may now and then become expedient to depart from the straight and narrow path of classical prose diction; so, if you will please pardon me, I will "remove my coat" and be frank with you.

I think that if you can recall having seen me personally while I was a patient in the tubercular cottage at the sanitarium that I was usually in a cheerful mood; that I invariably carefully complied with all rules and regulations; and that our relations were courteous and polite, and that when I left, my discharge certificate bore the note: "No objection to his readmission is known to exist." So my record is without any blemish whatever.

I suffered intensely the last six weeks of my stay at Battle Mountain, but I think the doctors will recall that I said but little, for I knew that the temperature record would speak for me, but I found that the record "spoke to nobody"; at least, if it did, it fell on deaf ears. When I felt my pulse running like a mill race and my temperature seemingly well above the hundred mark, never once, not once, did either you or your subordinates ever say one word to me about it. My suspicions as to high pulse and temperature were several times confirmed by the nurse, who told me of an unusually high pulse and temperature, and I heard the nurse tell you about it and I heard her tell Dr. Milligan about it. One day, when my side was cramping me so badly that I couldn't get a comfortable breath, I called you over to my bed and asked you to sound my side with your stethoscope. You hurriedly placed the instrument to my side and said, "Oh, yes, yes; moist rales," and before I could get my breath to tell you what misery I was in you had lubricatingly glided half way down the ward to the door. That same morning I took particular pains to note that you stood for 11 seconds staring into a vacant cupboard in my ward to see if the two blankets on the bottom shelf were properly folded. But you sounded the fever-parched lungs of a sick man just 6 seconds. Don't flinch at my exactness, for I had my watch under the cover and was observing you. I saw you spend from 2 to 10 minutes a day looking into cupboards and lockers, a thing the nurse could easily have done, while at the same time you only devoted from 5 to 8 seconds to the miserable, emaciated sick men in the same wards. You made a practice of this. I checked the time you were supposed to consult the fever charts before you should come into the wards, too. It usually took you 7 to 10 seconds to enter the chartroom and come out into the ward. This proves beyond peradventure that you never looked at anybody's chart before coming into the wards, a thing that no doctor with any regard for professional ethics would think of doing, and you know it. Dr. Milligan did identically the same thing; only he, if anything, was more abbreviated than you were. He would pay absolutely no attention to the nurse when she would tell him that so and so was running abnormal temperature and pulse. And if a man looked as if he were going to say something, Dr. Milligan expeditiously moved on. It is beyond me to understand how two doctors can possibly have the unmitigated effrontery to pass before a large number of intelligent sick men day after day with such an absurdly transparent showing of professional hypocrisy. Almost every man in the ward saw it and commented on it. I heard Frank H. Henderson try to tell you one day of the exceedingly sharp pains he was having in his back, and before he could hardly get the words out of his mouth you said, "Oh, yes, yes; how's your side?" and immediately you lubricatingly glided past him.

You will read in my printed letter where I stated that I had to ask you five times to operate on the tumor on my head before I finally got your attention, although you admitted in the first instance that the operation was expedient. In this connection permit me to say that the tumor is again showing signs of abnormal growth, which means that you did not kill the abnormal tissue, which would have easily been possible by the use of a little caustic acid. But instead of cauterizing the tissue you only jabbed a little probe around in there a few times—possibly you were suffering from "writer's cramp" that day, due to having signed so many special requisitions for apples for the tubercular patients (which they didn't get), which apples you had promised to get on so many occasions. When I'm thinking of nothing, I'm thinking of your promises. I never in my life was in a place where men had to be continually begging for things which were provided for them by regulation, but which they couldn't get without assuming a continual spirit of mendicity. No patient bothered you for anything not provided by the regulations. You were not restricted by any regulation or by a lack of funds (your F. Y. 1912 report shows that you turned back more than $21,000), yet why was it that you had to be importuned to replace eggs when they would run out? Why was it that eggs were ever out? Why was it that such ration components as tomato ketchup, graham bread, apple butter, sirup, port wine (which the men had to have in taking raw eggs), and various other items were constantly running out? And why was it that the men had to howl before these items were replaced on the tables? No explanation was ever made. No questions supposed to be asked. And yet you had the effrontery to face those men day after day. You would come through the wards looking like a brass band on dress parade, but when a man tried to say anything to you, you would immediately make a noise like a "stop watch." Now, steady yourself and don't get excited. If I had as much of your gall as would cling to the tip end of a bumblebee's stinger, I would be the Czar of Russia in less time than it would take a Government mule to "boost" you up over the flagpole out there in front of your office. Now, please be comfortable, for I know you can stomach a great deal. Any man that can, month in and month out, ignore the importunities of a ward full of sick men to get them a barrel of sawdust to keep the dust down when the floors are swept, any man that can ignore that can stand most anything. I fancy that were Uncle Sam to ride up and hitch his mule to that flagpole that you could provide yourself with a barrel of whitewash a darned sight quicker than you provided the men in the tubercular cottage with a barrel of sawdust.

I do not expect that you or any other mediocre doctor can enhance a man's appetite, or that you can provide him with a new pair of lungs, or that you could put a new lining in his stomach, or that you could cure his pleurisy. Now, in the absence of your known inability to do these things, the only thing under heaven that you could do would have been to feed a man; but this was the thing which you stubbornly and persistently refused to do. Twenty-one cents a day for food for a sick man! Are you proud of it? Suppose the Mayo brothers knew of this. Suppose the Rockefeller Institute, of New York, knew this. Wouldn't they lean back and laugh with a loud guffaw? During the F. Y. 1912 you could have spent 37 cents a day for food for every patient severally instead of only 21 cents, had you only spent that $21,000 that you turned back.

But right here lay your only opportunity of showing the board of managers that you had an excuse for holding your job, and that was by making a showing for saving—never mind whether you made a record for helping sick humanity. Are you proud of the record of the cases that have come and gone from the tubercular wards there during the past five or six months? Have you any records to show that you have been producing good results? There's Fred Culver, Frank H. Henderson, Henrysen, George Dunn, William Noel, George Cossboom, Morris Rosenfield, and a number of others, men who took the greatest care of themselves, but who steadily declined. And as to what these men think of you and your treatment, just write them and find out. What some of us really think would hardly look well spread out on this white paper.

Now, if I were feeling half-way well, I might write you a rather caustic letter, but, as it is, I will not say anything that might be calculated to hurt your feelings. So I am going to close, and submit the foregoing remarks to your own conscience and your innermost meditation. Remember that it is sick humanity that is speaking to you out of these written pages. It is the voice of not only one sick man, but the pleading of dozens, nay hundreds, who have gone to you for treatment; gone to a man who Uncle Sam expects shall do his best for the men that ruined their lives and their health in an effort to serve Uncle Sam. Are you worthy of the trust Uncle Sam has reposed in you? Do you think that all the men who come to you for treatment are sick on account of vicious habits? That was a very unkind cut of Maj. Wadsworth, when he said that most of the Spanish-American War men that entered the homes were there because of over-indulgences which had rendered them unable to take care of themselves. This is sweet consolation to a man after he has ruined his health while lying out in the mud in the Philippines and Cuba, trying to help defend the honor of the United States. Yet this Maj. Wadsworth was very loud in his ostentatious declarations about having a heart full of sympathy for us men. Simply because it now and then occurs that a man comes into the homes who is a wreck from vicious habits, this, to Maj. Wadsworth's mind, is sufficient grounds for branding a majority of them with the same odious charge.

It would hardly appear wise for me to offer any suggestions to you. But you know those homes were built for the accommodation of men in my condition, and you and some others were hired by Uncle Sam to take care of us, but through your vacillating procrastinating policy, we are unable to partake of the bounty provided for us by our faithful Uncle Sam. True, we could stay with you for a time, but, as has been the experience of many of us, we'd pay for it with our own life's blood, and nobody knows it any better than you do yourself. I say, in the name of sick, suffering men, come out of it! But, never mind, Colonel, there's usually a "calm before the storm." I would advise you to see to it well that your whitewash barrel is well filled. I have read some "very interesting" letters from Washington; at least they would be of great "interest" to you, no doubt. But, sit tight for the present, and keep your friends in Congress well lined up on the front page of the menus of Battle Mountain Sanitarium, and I am quite sure they will not desert you when the day of adversity comes upon you.

Yours, respectfully,

WILFORD W. DAVIS.

FORMER CHIEF ENGINEER A. L. NICHOLS MAKES DIRECT CHARGES AGAINST THE GOVERNOR OF THE WESTERN BRANCH HOME.

MILDRED, KANS., September 21, 1913.

Hon. D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Member of Congress, Leavenworth, Kans.

MY DEAR MR. ANTHONY: By careful attention to the newspapers I have been able to learn the decision of the Board of Managers in the case I so recently presented to them at their recent session at the Western Branch.

When I appeared before them I believed it was the consensus of opinion among the various members, or at least a part of them, that a liberal coat of whitewash was to be applied to the responsible party. This was by intuition, if you will permit me to so describe it, hence I presented no other matters than directly affected the matter at issue.

Now, I am able to present the following charges and substantiate them if given the opportunity to do so before the proper authority. These charges apply to the commanding officer of the home, and while he may not be cognizant of the conditions charged, yet he, as the active managing officer, is derelict in his duties in that it is his business to know or find out these things, and were he not so unapproachable and so supercilious in his actions he would have found them out long ago:

1. He is entirely out of sympathy with the members and is harsh and unrelenting with any members brought before him for minor infractions of the home rules.

2. Members of the home guard who are on police duty are required to work from 12 to 18 hours per day every day of the week. This is in violation of the law regulating hours of labor on Government work.

3. Women of ill repute have made their camp on the home grounds and preyed upon the members of the home, while no effort has been made to eject them from the home grounds or to protect the members.

4. Apparently no effort has been made to secure the cooperation of the State or county authorities in the protection of the members from the dangers which lurk along the "Pike."

5. He has shown discrimination among the civilian employees in various ways, among which are the permission to some employees of an inferior class to take their meals at the "noncommissioned officers' mess," while employees of a higher grade are required to eat at the general mess.

6. He conspired, in violation of an act of Congress, to erect additional buildings on the home grounds for the residence of civilian employees.

7. He has failed to secure the most economical and efficient operation of the home by discharging faithful and competent employees and substituting inexperienced and incompetent, who have failed signally in the performance of the duties assigned to them and yet are retained in the employ of the home.

8. He is not in harmony with the subordinate officers of the home and does not secure the hearty cooperation due the superior officer.

9. He has been guilty of permitting surgeons in the employ of the home to maintain offices in near-by cities and to spend a part of their time in these offices in the practice of medicine and surgery.

10. He as commanding officer is responsible for the conditions resulting from the recent invasion of bedbugs, as it was his duty to see that steps were taken to eradicate the evil upon being advised that the bugs were prevalent and to see that all filth was removed.

11. Members have been given the "gate" when their offense did not warrant such extreme penalties. He is vindictive to such an extent that the slightest crossing of his wishes results in the final discharge of employees and the "gate" for members who have been the cause of even a fancied grievance.

These, with probably some additional ones, are the charges I am prepared to submit, and I transmit them to you for your inspection and opinion thereon.

If in your opinion there be any chance to secure action, I am only too willing to go in and stay to the finish.

I have such credentials as would enable me to reach the ears of Senators REED, STONE, and THOMPSON with my story. Whether the story would interest them to such an extent as to enlist their support is a matter of opinion.

Very truly, yours,

A. L. NICHOLS.

A SAMPLE OF THE "TENDER" TREATMENT ACCORDED UNFORTUNATE VETERANS IN THE HAMPTON HOME.

Affidavit of John J. Swab concerning the Hampton (Va.) National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers:

On or about the 27th of February past, as I was going into the Southern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Phoebus—across the bridge from Phoebus to the home—I saw the small wagon used as a patrol wagon backed up to the guard's house at aforesaid Phoebus bridge, and a large man, guard of the home, gave the sharp command, "Bring him out"; then the guards in charge brought out of the guardhouse a man, member of the home, whom I know as Norman, of Company "E." Norman was quiet, but appeared dazed by drink. Norman was led up to the wagon and very violently told to "get in." Norman put both hands on the wagon bed and prepared to get in, but being a heavy old man, dazed by drink, was slow, whereat the aforesaid powerful guard seized Norman by both knees and threw him into the wagon with great force and violence. I then passed the wagon, thinking Norman killed, but the guard quickly closed the rear of the wagon; however, I saw that Norman was bleeding from hurts there received. On the following Sunday I met the hospital steward and asked him how Norman was, he having been taken from the police station and from there to the hospital. The hospital steward told me that Norman had one ear nearly torn off, a bad cut on the temple, and one on the forehead; also that the doctor's report was that he had a concussion of the brain; that he was silly. I asked what the police report was; he said that the report was that Norman fell off the bench at the police station and injured himself so. I thereat told the hospital steward what I saw and told him how Norman was injured; he told me he would report the case so, but nothing came of it. Instances of guards' brutality are common, and this is a typical case, where, perhaps, the injury was greater than usual. These guards seem to be protected and encouraged in rough usage to the members of the "home" by their superiors.

I also wish to call attention to the semipenal character of the home. There are three gates to the home; at each gate at least two guards who closely scrutinize the pass of the member who wishes to go out or in. These passes are taken or withheld for trifling breaches of discipline. The guards have evidently hard and set instructions from their superiors. Also the food is poor, and the affiant often had nothing but bread and coffee for meals, while the Government appropriations are large and seem plenty, with a very poor table.

I have seen Gov. Knox severely reprimand a member for wearing tan shoes contrary to rules. Browbeating and general aggressive repressiveness are common. Many other instances can be cited, but I forbear.

[SEAL.] JOHN J. SWAB.

STATE OF VIRGINIA, County of Elizabeth City, to wit:

I, W. H. Power, a notary public in and for the county aforesaid, in the State of Virginia, whose commission expires on the 30th day of November, 1915, do hereby certify that John J. Swab, whose name is signed to the foregoing writing, dated this 17th day of March, 1914, has sworn the same before me in my county aforesaid.

Given under my hand this 17th day of March, 1914.

A TYPICAL APPEAL.

SAWTELLE, CAL., May 20, 1914.

CONGRESSMAN ANTHONY,
Washington, D. C.

HONORED SIR: Pardon the liberty I take in addressing you, but feeling that you have the best interest of the disabled soldiers at heart I appeal to you in the name of humanity. Am suffering with pulmonary tuberculosis, without pension, and unable to do manual labor. Was a patient in Soldiers' Home Hospital, but was dropped from the rolls and ordered from the grounds on May 16, charged with "using insulting and insubordinate language to the surgeon." These are the exact words printed in the general order. I am innocent of this offense, as I could prove, but at my trial the governor refused to allow me to bring any witnesses for my defense. Even if I were guilty of the offense charged I claim that the punishment was contrary to the laws governing the national homes, since I am totally disabled and without means of support, and requiring medical treatment. I do not wish to be a charge upon the county, and appeal to you for redress. I refer you to my excellent record of service, covering a period of over five years in the Regular Army, and I have a perfectly clear record in the home, never before having been called to the governor's court. This is the first offense charged against me in the home. Hoping that you will see that justice is given me, I remain,

Yours, sincerely,

CHARLES W. BADGER,
Late Co. G, 17th U. S. Inf.; Co. L, 19th Inf.

VETERAN LIVES IN JAIL—PREFERS IT TO SOLDIERS' HOME.

[From the Los Angeles (Cal.) Herald, May 2, 1914.]

Preferring the county jail to life at the Soldiers' Home at Sawtelle, Lawrence Dunn, aged 82, has left the institution never to return of his own volition.

Dunn, who served four years in the Civil War and who is an old friend of Capt. George Gallagher, county jailer, applied for admission to the jail and a place to sleep 10 days ago. Sheriff Hammel gave special permission to admit Dunn, and he says he is enjoying his entertainment there better than the accommodations at the Soldiers' Home.

The old soldier declares that the regulations of the home made him unbearably miserable and that he would rather camp in the river bed than to return.

Dunn alleges that Gov. Barry denied him the privilege of spending his pension money, of which he has a balance of $134.

AN APPEAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE WISCONSIN HOME.

NATIONAL HOME, WIS., April 15, 1914.

Congressman D. R. ANTHONY,
Committee on Military Affairs, Washington, D. C.:

Questions supporting your bill:

Is Gov. Wheeler physically and mentally competent? Always sober?

Chaplain Tisworth never visited sick. Was generally disliked. Why bring him back?

Why present commissary when all inspectors find him incompetent?

Why take decent quarters away from veteran bandmaster and allow civilian clerk officer's quarters?

Why so many civilian officers contrary to law?

Is entire medical staff graduate licensed physicians?

Why so economical with lights, etc., for veterans and not for officers?

Should Col. Miller promote his personal friends?

Give veterans a hearing or investigate all homes.

Help us.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES A. TAYLOR OF BAD FOOD AND OTHER BAD CONDITIONS AT NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME, HAMPTON, VA.

NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME,
HAMPTON, VA., February 18, 1914.

TO THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE INVESTIGATING NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOMES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At the request of many inmates of this home I am writing you concerning the condition of things here, which are fast becoming intolerable. We are pleased to note a movement to transfer the management of the homes to the War Department.

While there are several abuses here of which we justly complain, the more serious one is the quality and the quantity of the food served in the mess halls. Very many of the meals set before the inmates are so meager and unsubstantial that we, the inmates, in order to keep the body sufficiently nourished, are under the necessity of taking several meals each week—at least one per day—outside the home dining halls. For these meals we must pay from 20 to 35 cents. Now, it could be shown, we believe, that this scant feeding at the home tables is in accordance with a well-devised plan on the part of the home officials to compel the inmates, by force of circumstances, to leave a very liberal percentage of their pension money at the home store, hotel, and restaurant.

Color is given to this belief by the fact that about 30 days prior to the payment of pensions, notices are posted in all the barracks that credit at the hotel, store, or restaurant, to the amount of one month's pension, will be extended to pensioners who apply therefor. As soon as pensions are paid, all passes held by members of four nonactive companies, sometimes called convalescents, are annulled and the gates are closed against them for five days, thus compelling them to patronize the home hotel or to go hungry. This exceedingly unjust action of the home officials affects nearly 400 men. This necessity for additional and better food, we believe, is not only recognized and understood by the home officials, but we also believe that it is created and fostered by them; that it is to this necessity that the home hotel and restaurant cater, and on which they depend entirely for patronage.

The method of punishing inmates for trifling infractions of the home rules are brutal in some cases, degrading and humiliating to the offender.

The menial work which they are required to do under the guardianship of a squad of "home" police creates intense bitterness and resentment within the hearts of these old, bent, and crippled unfortunates.

Is this in keeping with Mr. Lincoln's expressed wish and purpose, "to care for him who shall have borne the battle"?

And then the method of holding up an inmate's pension, wholly or in part, for months is, we believe, without warrant of law. The scavenger work done about the home grounds by comrades who are hardly able to crawl about should be done by laborers hired for the purpose.

As evidence of my sincere interest in whatever concerns the veteran soldiers of the Civil War, permit me to say that I served in the Twelfth New York Infantry as a drummer, in the Twenty-fourth New York Infantry as a private and sergeant, in the Twenty-fourth New York Cavalry as a first lieutenant and as a captain. My father served as a captain in the Twenty-fourth New York Infantry, and as captain and major in the Twenty-fourth New York Cavalry. One of my brothers served as a lieutenant in the Forty-ninth New York Infantry, as a captain and major in the United States Signal Corps, serving on the staff of Gen. Hancock and later on the staff of Gen. J. A. Logan. Another brother served as a sergeant in the Twenty-fourth New York Infantry and was killed at Bull Run August 30, 1862. One of my sons served in the Third New York in the War with Spain and in the Fifteenth United States Infantry in the Philippines. I am a companion of the M. O. L. L. Commandery of New York.

I respectfully refer you to the Hon. L. W. MOTT, Member of Congress, with whom I have been personally acquainted for many years.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. A. TAYLOR.

MORE INTERESTING DETAILS.

A Leavenworth newspaper of September 14, 1913, publishes these articles pertaining to conditions at the Leavenworth Soldiers' Home:

FORMER ENGINEER AT SOLDIERS' HOME TO SEE THE BOARD—MR. NICHOLS FEELS THAT HE WAS UNFAIRLY TREATED BY GOV. COOKE—HOW HIRED AND HOW FIRED—BOARD OF MANAGERS CAN UNDOUBTEDLY SECURE A VERY INTERESTING STORY FROM NICHOLS—OTHER EMPLOYEES VOUCH FOR HIM.

It is understood that Mr. A. L. Nichols, until a few months ago chief engineer at the Leavenworth Soldiers' Home, but now engineer in charge of a large steam plant at Mildred, Kans., will probably appear before the Board of Soldiers' Home Managers at their meeting to-day and ask for a full investigation by the board into the matter of his original appointment as chief engineer, and the methods used to force his resignation a few months ago.

When Mr. Nichols left the home he was given a testimonial, signed by the civilian employees and mechanics of the home, testifying to their high regard for him personally and to his ability as an engineer, although Gov. Cooke is said to have demanded his place, because he "was not securing sufficiently satisfactory results" from the antiquated boilers and steam-generating apparatus at the home in which oil is burned as fuel.

It seems that when Mr. Nichols was first appointed chief engineer at the home, the late J. H. Johns, a veteran soldier and former capable engineer at the home, was an applicant for reappointment. Capt. Johns has left a written statement that when he went to Gov. Cooke the governor promised to recommend him to the board, but said that the appointment lay entirely in the hands of the board of managers. When the matter was put up to Maj. Wadsworth and Maj. Warner of the board they assured him that the matter lay entirely in the hands of the governor through his recommendation to the board. Capt. Johns made the statement before he died that the board members undoubtedly followed the governor's recommendation, but that Gov. Cooke had "double crossed" him and Mr. Nichols of Kansas City received the appointment.

Now, Mr. Nichols's story of his appointment will undoubtedly be interesting to the board. He says that he lived in Kansas City and was not a candidate for the place until a Kansas City man named Jack Squires, an electrical contractor, who had done work at the home, asked him if he did not want the job of chief engineer at the Leavenworth Soldiers' Home, saying he could get it for him. It seems that Mr. Squires is a son-in-law of Gov. Cooke, and would naturally have considerable influence at the soldiers' home.

Mr. Nichols took the place, and from every employee and officer of the home, comes the statement that he filled it with great skill and satisfaction until, so Mr. Nichols's friends state, Gov. Cooke concluded to make a place for the present incumbent who was a college friend of a young son of Gov. Cooke. Mr. Nichols feels that these family considerations should not be permitted by the board of managers to cost him a position with the Government, which all claim he so well filled.

It is believed that Mr. Nichols is entitled to justice and vindication at the hands of the board of managers.

VETERAN SLOUGH CRITICIZES WORK AT HOME HOSPITAL—SAYS WAS COMPELLED TO LEAVE SOLDIERS' HOME TO GET PROPER FOOD AND TREATMENT—CROWDED OUT BY CIVILIANS—IF PHYSICAL CONDITION PERMITS, MR. SLOUGH WILL APPEAR BEFORE BOARD OF MANAGERS—STATES DOCTORS SPOKE OF VETERANS AS "VICTIMS."

Another veteran who will appear before the Board of Soldiers' Home Managers at their meeting Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock, if his physical condition will permit, is Fred H. Slough, a Spanish War veteran. Mr. Slough is now a patient at St. John's Hospital, Leavenworth, having been compelled to go there because of what he claims were unbearable conditions at the soldiers' home hospital, of which Dr. Fryer, Gov. Cooke's son-in-law, is chief surgeon. Should he not be able to appear personally before the board the sick veteran is preparing a statement which the board can secure if it so desires.

Mr. Slough stated to a Times representative that he was formerly a member of the Leavenworth Soldiers' Home, but was compelled by unpleasant conditions to voluntarily withdraw therefrom on August 15. Being a $24 pensioner he was able to do this. It seems that Mr. Slough is suffering from catarrhal appendicitis and resulting appendicostomy, or an open wound in the abdomen. He was compelled to go to the soldiers' home hospital for treatment, but he says conditions were such that it put him in a highly nervous state and that in his delicate condition he needed plenty of milk and eggs and nourishing food suitable for an invalid and which he could not there secure. He says he and another veteran with a serious medical case were given a very comfortable room, but that finally the soldiers' home authorities ordered these two stricken soldiers out of the small room and into one of the large wards, where his condition grew steadily worse, and as he had lost in weight from 160 to 129 pounds he concluded to withdraw from the home and go to St. John's Hospital in Leavenworth, where the sisters would give him better care. And Mr. Slough says that he and the other sick soldier were removed from their private room in the hospital because the authorities desired to and did turn the room over to two civilian employees of the home who were being treated in the hospital.

It seems that one of the things that made Mr. Slough extremely nervous was that his room was next to the doctor's room where sick veterans were received for treatment, and he says that as one veteran would go out he would hear the doctor say to his assistant, "Send in the next victim."

It would certainly seem as if the story told by Mr. Slough was serious enough to receive careful investigation at the hands of the Board of Managers.

VETERAN REPORTS BEDBUGS THICK—WHILE NURSING, HE WAS OFTEN CALLED UPON BY SICK PATIENTS TO KILL THEM.

The Times is in receipt of two communications from the soldiers' home bearing upon the expected investigation there to-day. One is from a former nurse in the hospital, and tells of a bad condition there. It is as follows:

Editor of the Times:

I take pleasure in thanking you for publishing the story which you did in your issue of September 9. I positively assure you of the truth of same, especially in reference to bedbugs. I will say that a few weeks ago, before the hospital wards and barrack buildings were fumigated, which has just recently been done, I myself, six weeks ago, was night nurse (male). One of my patients (paralyzed), when I would go to his bed at 12 o'clock to turn him over, I could scrape the bedbugs off his pillow. Many and many's the time he called me to kill them. He had to buy a skull cap to keep them off.

I suppose that after the ladies you mentioned spoke of bedbugs they had to get to work.

If a man is able bodied, he need not have bedbugs, because he can use the different disinfectants which are furnished him, or can buy some remedy or may scald the bed. But the sick patients can not do that, and the female nurses keep the male help doing so much of this work that a man simply can not keep the beds clean and do other things he is told to do.

The other correspondent appears to be unduly suspicious of the board of managers and doubtful of its accomplishing anything. He expresses his doubts in verse, as follows:

BOARD MAY INVESTIGATE.

The board of managers comes,
Old vets will fix them now.
The band, it plays, and the drums
Go "ripety-rip, bow wow."

The board of managers comes,
They drink their wine and they wink,
When the old vet tells his tale of woe;
Then they take another drink.

The board of managers goes,
The old vet gets the gate.
What they have done the devil knows,
God never enters the gate.

LETTER AND NEWSPAPER CLIPPINGS FROM GRANT KRESLER, SAWTELLE, CAL., IN REGARD TO CONDITIONS IN TUBERCULAR WARD AT SOLDIERS' HOME IN CALIFORNIA.

HAMILTON S. HAWKINS CAMP,
United Spanish War Veterans.

Hon. D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On account of our mutual desire to have the national soldiers' homes under the care of the War Department, I take the liberty of sending the inclosed clippings from the Westgate News, the truth of which I can vouch for, and, if necessary, prove by affidavits. Since the homes are expected to care for at least 400 tubercular members yearly, and a large majority of these being Spanish War veterans in the prime of life, special provision should be made by the Government for this class of patients, many of whom have a chance to recover if given the proper care and treatment.

Having at one time been a patient in the soldier's home hospital, and having lived in close proximity to it during the past 10 years, I can make affidavit that I have never seen anyone cured of tuberculosis there, nor have I ever heard of anyone being cured in any other national home. In fact, on account of adverse conditions, all who come here for treatment give up the fight at the outset and hopelessly wait for certain death, in some cases taking much longer than others. The officers of this home, in order to cover up their deficiencies, pursue a method of intimidation toward the members, and threaten dire vengeance upon any who protest, Maj. Hayden, the surgeon, being the worst offender in this respect. I have been asked by my comrades there to take this matter up with you in their behalf, and I trust I may enlist your sympathy.

Very sincerely,

GRANT KRESLER.

A PLEA FOR BETTER TREATMENT OF TUBERCULAR PATIENTS AT THE PACIFIC BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME.

Although no absolute specific has yet been discovered to cure the great white plague, still all reputable physicians agree that plenty of good nourishment, fresh air, and rest will invariably cause improvement and in incipient cases cure this disease. What is the record of the tubercular ward at the soldiers' home? Like in Dante's Inferno, all who enter here leave hope behind. And why? Because of the failure in the first essential of providing proper nourishment to the patients. The standard bill of fare for all is composed of rough food of poor selection, such as is furnished in camps to the laboring class, and hardly fit for consumption by these patients, who almost invariably have a combination of ailments in the digestive tract.

The food is sufficient in quantity but poor in quality and cooked execrably.

The meat is generally the poorest cuts, the eggs of the cold-storage variety, the milk has but a small percentage of butter fats, and there is a total lack of fresh vegetables, an article of diet which should be furnished in abundance since it is healthful and cheap.

The cook is an old lady in her dotage, who should be in an old ladies' home rather than attempting something for which she is absolutely unqualified, having had no previous experience cooking for invalids.

Because the board of managers considered $35 per month ample wage for a cook, she was given the position, and is kept, although proven incapable, for fear that none better could be procured at this price.

At the recent congressional investigation Senator JONES remarked that if competent employees could not be obtained at the present scale of wages the board of managers should raise the scale.

This is a liberal Government, and really means that every soldier shall have the best care and attention that money can procure, but the soldiers have to thank the board of managers for this present method of false economy, backed up by a chief surgeon who is willing to sacrifice professional honor in order to hold his job, since he knows that conditions should be otherwise, and it is in his power to recommend sweeping changes for the better.

ONE WHO KNOWS.

GOOD, CLEAN FOOD; RICH, RED BLOOD.

Since it is an established fact that an abundance of good nourishing food is absolutely essential in the treatment of tuberculosis, good, red blood being necessary to fight the inroads of the tubercular bacilli, how can a surgeon in charge allow the existing conditions at the soldiers' home?

Picture to yourself bedfast patients being served corn beef and cabbage or food equally unpalatable and cooked after a fashion in vogue at the 5-cent restaurants. Is it a wonder that their stomachs rebel and that they give up the fight for life? The records show that 90 per cent of those who go to bed die. In spite of a letter signed by all the patients and sent to the surgeon in charge asking for a better cook and better food, the present incumbent feels so sure of her position that she has presumed to insult patients, and claims that she is the major surgeon's pet and that no influence can have her removed. Individual patients have gone to the surgeon with complaints, but instead of receiving redress they have been threatened with dire punishment, and some have been sent to another ward in the hospital, although the surgeon contends that tuberculosis is contagious and infectious, and denies the patients the library privilege on that account.

It is apparent that complaints from patients are useless. Now, what recourse is left? Appeals to the board of managers would be returned for investigation, and we would have the usual farce of the officers investigating their own misdemeanors.

They would fix up a few good meals and have them inspected, and then whitewash all charges. My contention is that since free sanitariums are being erected in every State in the Union, there being six such in this State, where any persons can receive the best care and treatment free, since the best physicians in the vicinity tender their services gratis, why can not the Federal Government recognize that they owe a debt to these men and give them at least as good care and treatment as the ordinary citizen can get outside the home for nothing? I claim that the food should be bought separately from the general mess for the tubercular ward and sent direct from the quartermaster's department and not, as at present, be first sent to the hospital kitchen and then doled out at the pleasure of those in charge there, they naturally keeping the most desirable portion for their own mess.

ONE WHO KNOWS.

THE OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE BOARD TO CONGRESS NEVER TELLS SUCH THINGS AS THESE.

The annual report made to Congress by the board of managers carefully suppresses the complaints made by the soldiers against the management. A perusal of this volume would give the innocent reader the idea that the homes are but little short of a heaven on earth, and the local officials in their reports take pains to scratch each other's backs with mutual commendations. But the following article from a local newspaper describing the events which transpired at the meeting in September, 1913, of the board at the Leavenworth Branch

Home will give some insight into real conditions. Previous publicity was the only reason why the board permitted itself to give this extended hearing, and the only reason the veterans appeared before the board instead of being deterred by the usual fear of being afterwards "given the gate" was because of the previous assurance by the board that men who appeared would be protected from the vengeance of local officials.

As a result of the bedbug exposure the chief surgeon of the home was discharged. This action of the board has been severely criticized, because the executive head of the home was said to be primarily responsible for failure to make proper inspection of conditions. The former surgeon is an exceptionally competent medical practitioner. He had been in the Government service for about 13 years, and, it is understood, his appointment was made through the influence of Gov. Cooke, his father-in-law, who was then a member of the board of managers.

Here is the story of this one session of the board at the Leavenworth Branch:

BOARD OF MANAGERS HEARS MANY COMPLAINTS OF CONDITIONS AT INSTITUTION HERE—GOV. COOKE UNDER FIRE—CHARGED HE DISMISSED NICHOLS AND HIRED INCOMPETENT MAN AS ENGINEER—SYLVESTER, "GIVEN THE GATE," TO BE READMITTED.

The Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home last night completed its annual inspection of the Leavenworth Branch. The board arrived Sunday noon, and in a short time completed its routine inspection of barracks, mess hall, and other departments.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon the board convened to hear complaints. It adjourned at 8 o'clock, and not one-sixth of the complaints had been heard.

MANY CHARGES MADE.

At 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon the board convened again, and listened until 6 to complaints made by veterans of bedbugs and other unsatisfactory conditions in the hospital, of summary dismissal of members without money or means for subsistence, unfair treatment at the mess, discrimination by the head matron at the mess hall, cursing of colored members by an official, a "Jim Crow" rule, and last, but not least, juggling of appointments to suit the wishes of Gov. Sidney G. Cooke, despite protests of other officials to whom the governor's appointees are directly responsible. For the first time in the board's history a newspaper man was present at a hearing.

In all, 21 veterans and citizens appeared before the board, the largest number of protests ever heard by the board of managers at any institution in the United States, according to a statement made by Franklin Murphy, ex-governor of New Jersey and vice president of the board. Not only did veterans testify as to the unsatisfactory conditions, but Mrs. J. J. Edic and Mrs. James Duffy, of this city, appeared voluntarily to testify concerning bedbugs in the hospital, which, according to their description, fairly swarmed in certain wards.

The number and seriousness of the charges made it impossible for the board to pass judgment on all cases until a more thorough investigation is made. So Col. James E. Miller, inspector general and chief surgeon, will remain here an indefinite time, probing into the various complaints.

However, the case of Marcus Sylvester, a Civil War veteran, summarily "given the gate" by Gov. Cooke about a week ago, was so pitiful that before leaving the board instructed Sylvester to make application for readmission. When discharged, Sylvester was penniless and was forced to live off the kindness of Leavenworth citizens. His "crime" had been to write a letter to the Pension Bureau in Washington asking the reason for delay in his pension and intimating it was held up by home authorities so they might get the interest.

While it has not been officially announced that changes other than the dismissal of Maj. Fryer will follow the investigation, there is little doubt a shake-up in the mess hall will be made before Col. Miller leaves, the allegations of veterans concerning discrimination and harsh treatment being so vehement. Members of the board intimated at various times during the hearing such a step was contemplated.

Although the board showed every kindness toward the complainants, several of the feeble and tottering old men showed timidity and talked in a rambling, almost incoherent manner. A suggestion has been made that in the future an attorney, or "first friend," be retained to present each case to the board in a terse, businesslike manner.

GOVERNOR ACCUSED.

The most sensational revelation of Gov. Cooke's alleged despotism was made during the hearing of A. L. Nichols, of Mildred, Kans., formerly chief engineer, discharged by Gov. Cooke. It was proved that Gov. Cooke employed as Nichols's successor a man described by Capt. C. M. Pearsoll to the board of managers as "incompetent, insubordinate, and lazy."

Furthermore, Capt. Pearsoll, differing from other officials, excepting the treasurer, is under bond and responsible in a monetary way for the actions of men in his department. Yet, despite Capt. Pearsoll's apprehension and his sincere belief that Mr. Nichols was the most competent engineer ever in his employ, Gov. Cooke arbitrarily discharged him and appointed an "incompetent, insubordinate, and lazy" man.

Primarily Nichols was discharged because he had used too much heating oil. Nichols presented figures showing the consumption during the months that he had acted as engineer and the consumption during similar months a year previous, when his predecessor was in charge. In many months his figures, taken from the quartermaster's report, showed a decided decrease, and in only one month was there a noticeable increase.

NO ACTION TAKEN.

Nichols declared, and Capt. Pearsoll substantiated his declarations, to the board that the increase during that month was caused by a defective heater, which caused the building to be heated by live steam run through the pipes and necessitating, as is well known, much more fuel consumption.

While the board listened attentively, it showed no disposition to right matters, and before leaving Maj. Wadsworth announced Nichols's dismissal was final. The matter of retaining and discharging employees laid entirely in the hands of the governor, he said.

If Capt. Pearsoll wished to retain Nichols, he should have appeared before the board before his dismissal. As yet no officer at the home has had the temerity to cross the governor in any matter of this kind.

Nichols was first to appear before the board. His reasons for desiring an audience, he said, was that he wished an investigation as to the reason for his dismissal.

NO REASON, SAYS NICHOLS.

"That reason has been given," said Maj. James W. Wadsworth, president of the board.

"Not in my estimation," retorted Nichols.

"Retaining and discharging men is left to the governor and heads of various departments," said Maj. Wadsworth. "In your case it was left to Gov. Cooke and the quartermaster. That's all the board knows."

"According to my understanding my resignation was not asked by the quartermaster."

"You were discharged for using too much fuel oil," said Maj. Wadsworth, "and there were other incidents cited."

"I realize that, sir; but under conditions as they were it could not be averted. The heater was defective, and my only alternative was to keep the institution warmed by live steam, which, necessarily, would consume more oil. I explained the matter to the proper officials and asked at what temperature I might keep the various buildings. They told me, and I complied with their demands."

Here Maj. Wadsworth explained the board's position, saying that while it had supreme power over the governor, yet in such instances it was necessary for the board to give the governor leeway. It was in this case to the best interests of the home that the governor's recommendations be upheld.

WRECKED A PLANT.

"But the retaining of this man will not be to the best interests of the home," said Nichols. "An investigation into the operation of the ice plant will prove that. The present man is incompetent and inexperienced. He was employed as an assistant under me, and his work was so unsatisfactory that I was obliged to release him."

"Did you discharge him?"

"No, sir; but I obtained a position for him outside of the home, and six months later he left the plant he was in charge of a total wreck; that is, the light and heating plant at Salina.

"In regard to the ice plant, while I was in charge 7,500 pounds of ice were turned out daily. Shortly before discharged 30 more freezing cans were installed and a larger output made possible. Yet such has not been the case."

CITES FIGURES.

Nichols then presented the quartermaster's report concerning the consumption of fuel oil. He read to the board the amount of oil used certain months in 1911, when his predecessor was in charge, and the consumption during the same months when he was engineer. This report follows:

	1911	1912
	Gallons.	Gallons.
July	102,124	75,125
August	84,664	57,876
September	102,845	105,771
October	148,746	190,890
November	210,833	209,833
December	284,477	322,302

It was during December the heater was out of order.

The board made an ineffectual attempt to learn just what reasons other than for the good of the home Gov. Cooke had for discharging Nichols. It was stated by Nichols that he had heard that a college friendship between the governor's son and the chief engineer was responsible for his discharge. This Gov. Cooke later denied. That the governor contemplated his dismissal long before the consumption of fuel oil was thought of is firmly believed by Nichols. This belief is held by Nichols because of Gov. Cooke's alleged eagerness to move a house onto the grounds for certain employees, among whom is Russell, who had no home furnished him and who was working only on a small salary.

GOVERNOR TESTIFIES.

After Mr. Nichols retired Gov. Cooke and Capt. Pearsoll were summoned. Gov. Cooke was asked the reasons for Nichols's discharge.

Lack of a technical education, too much laxity in consumption of fuel, and carelessness were the general reasons for Nichols's dismissal, the governor affirmed. He did not pay enough attention to outside temperatures, said the governor, and kept up the same temperatures within, whether it was cold or warm outside. Gov. Cooke cited an instance where a fireman had been found asleep on duty, and Nichols defended him. The man was retained, and again found asleep. One or two other trifling incidents were recited by the governor.

"Did you talk to the quartermaster of Nichols's service?" asked Maj. Warner, of Kansas City.

"It was my impression that the quartermaster approved Nichols's service and thought him a good man."

Here Capt. Pearsoll interposed. There was some excuse for the excessive consumption, he thought, because an inferior heater had been installed by the engineer preceding Mr. Nichols.

"My prime objection to the new man is that he had been insubordinate to me, and in my opinion is incompetent and lazy."

FOR "HARMONY."

Then began an argument as to whether the governor or quartermaster should have the power of dismissal. Ex-Gov. Franklin Murphy contended that as the quartermaster was under bond for the engineer's actions he should be consulted in such matters, and while the governor also should have voice and was directly responsible to the board, yet they should act in harmony.

Gov. Cooke retorted to this and declared if he was head of the institution he wanted to be in complete charge. Capt. Pearsoll hastily informed the board that he always had tried to act in harmony with the governor.

Mrs. Edic and Mrs. Duffy, with their bedbug story, were the next to appear. Their stories were the same in general details. Mrs. Duffy's husband, a veteran partially paralyzed, entered the hospital in June.

When they visited him they saw two beds in his ward nearly alive with the vermin, they stated, and there were blood stains on the sheets where the bugs had been mashed by a woman cleaning the wards. Mr. Duffy's back was raw from bites, and when they removed him a few weeks later his mental condition was much worse.

"The medicine or something was causing him to lose his mind," said Mrs. Duffy.

DR. FRYER SUMMONED.

Maj. Fryer was then summoned before the board. He admitted there were bugs in that ward at that time, but declared the women's statements were somewhat overdrawn. He had done all in his power to rid the ward of the pests, he testified. The surgeon in charge of the ward was then called. He also admitted the presence of bugs, and declared it was infested when he took charge. Almost five months were consumed before they were killed.

After the two surgeons left, Col. Miller addressed the board, averring that such a condition was unprecedented, and he could not see why the bugs could not have been killed in a much shorter time. He knew that shortly after an assistant inspector reported them the bugs disappeared entirely. And a thorough inspection made since his arrival showed they were no longer in existence.

JOINER'S STORY.

Marshall Joiner, the Spanish-American War veteran who was "given the gate" because he wrote letters to President Wilson regarding alleged unfair treatment at the hands of Gov. Cooke, next appeared. He asked the board for an honorable discharge from the home, alleging that he had been unfairly treated by certain officials, especially Anna Malinowski, matron of the general mess hall. It was the matron, he said, who had "got the gate" for him. He had been arrested and tried before Gov. Cooke in "his kangaroo court."

"What is a kangaroo court?" asked Maj. Warner.

"Where the judge is accused and tries himself," retorted Joiner.

"Anna Malinowski is the real governor of the home," he declared. "She gets the gate for anyone she gets it in for."

He asked for witnesses to prove his statements. Waitresses, nurses, dining-hall officials, and old veterans were summoned.

Joiner's object was to show that he was kind to old veterans while in the hospital, and the patients in his ward had asked that he be given a position as ward man. He accused Maj. Fryer of holding up his appointment to the coveted position. He was in the hospital, according to Dr. Matz's testimony, for observation as to his mental condition. He proved, however, that the veterans in his ward wanted him for their ward man.

Then he asked other witnesses, old veterans, if in past years Anna Malinowski did not sell whisky to them and play cards with them in a joint on the "pike." This was agreed, and Miss Malinowski also admitted that in past years the home in which she lived was used as a joint. Furthermore, Joiner produced testimony from girls now in the hospital and restaurant that they left the mess hall because Miss Malinowski made it hard for them.

ALL KINDS OF CHARGES.

Complaints of nearly every description were lodged against the officials, including discrimination in giving employment to civilians in preference to veterans who are fitted for the work, cruelty in the hospital, etc.

THE HAMPTON HOME.

The following description of the national home at Hampton, Va., recently appeared in the Norfolk Daily News; it is typical of conditions in most of the homes:

AN OLD SOLDIER PROTESTS.

EDITOR, THE NEWS.

SIR: The reunion at Gettysburg has made a great many people think more about the "old soldier" than they are in the habit of doing; and I think that some information about the Southern Branch of the National Soldiers' Home will be welcomed by those who want to be just to the men who fought in the war of the sixties.

Enough money is probably appropriated for the men who are at the home in Hampton, but the funds are not properly divided. The officers get too much and the "beneficiaries of Government bounty" get too little. The number of prior choices make the soldier's share a "Hobson's choice." I may not be exactly accurate in the figures which I give, but they are not much out of the way. First, to consider the actual overhead:

Hon. Franklin Murphy, local manager.—Railroad fare, Pullman sleepers, hotel expenses for at least two trips a year to Hampton, Va.; Johnson City, Tenn.; Leavenworth, Kans.; Danville, Ill.; Marion, Ind.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Togus, Me.; Santa Monica, Cal.; and Washington. This outlay is a big treat at Government expense, while the real work has been done by two officials, President J. W. Wadsworth and Maj. Moses Harris, who each get about $5,000 apiece per year.

An expensive office is maintained at New York City, with a force to do the clerical work. The expense attendant on the New York office and trips for the sight-seeing board, together with salaries for inspectors and clerical hire, will probably approximate $60,000 to $70,000 a year. The system seems to require much clerical work in developing records for the "nesting of dishes," vital statistics, discipline, police court records, inspections—weekly, monthly, and otherwise—red cards, special passes for erring brethren who need consolations in the Phoebus art saloons, where special affection is displayed for old veterans.

This system and its various ramifications have apparently stood the test of time, and you may say "it is time tried and fire tested" and is really essential to the proper digestion and preparation of such food and toothsome luxuries as the honorable board and indulgent governor now at the helm of the Southern Branch, viz, Col. T. T. Knox, may at their discretion provide. At this point it is best not to overlook the qualities, experience, and usefulness of Maj. Mose Harris. His very delicate modesty prevents his shining publicity in the galaxy of unknown but genuine stars. His absence from the performance of board duties would be a sad loss to the home mess hall and kitchen.

Then come the local staff with their emoluments.

GOV. KNOX AND STAFF.

Gov. Col. T. T. Knox (retired), born in Tennessee July 3, 1849; cadet July 1, 1867; June, 1871, second lieutenant of Cavalry; July, 1898, transferred to Inspector General's Department, so continued until April 13, 1903, when retired; yearly pay, $3,850. Pay as governor, about $3,000. Total Government pay, about $6,850. Estimated amount of money value for free house rent, about 12 rooms furnished, free heat, light, free horse and carriage and horse feed, free vegetable garden, free flowers, $1,500. Grand total, $8,350. In addition thereto may be added the privilege of first choice of all meat cuts, milk and cream, vegetables and groceries at Government prices, which amounts to no inconsiderable sum of money for a family in the course of a year, particularly such a prominent family as that of Col. Knox.

Maj. F. E. Skinner, treasurer.—The major, who is a civilian, is provided with an abundant force to do all and singular his work of recording of the financial end of the local institution. The major is probably paid about $2,000 per annum for assisting in "bossing" the job. His other perquisites, the use of a dwelling house of about 9 rooms, furnished, with free heat, free light, free horse and carriage. His other monetary values are involved in the next choice of meat cuts, milk and cream, vegetables, and groceries at Government prices. The major is raising young America, and his perquisites all told may average about $1,500 per annum. Approximately, a good $3,500 job.

Maj. L. A. Thompson, surgeon.—In charge of the hospital, about a $2,500 salary. Residence of 8 or 10 rooms furnished. He enjoys free heat, free light, and the right to a free horse; prefers his own automobile. A Spanish-American soldier about 45 years old. Next on the meat cuts, milk and cream, vegetables, and groceries at Government prices.

Capt. D. C. Spencer, quartermaster.—Citizen and about 50 years old. Salary about $2,000. House of about 8 or 9 rooms, furnished. Free heat, free light, horse. Next cut of meats, milk and cream, vegetables, and groceries at Government prices. The captain's position may be rated at about $2,750 annual worth.

Capt. E. B. White, commissary of subsistence and superintendent of post fund.—Annual salary about $1,800. House, 8 or 9 rooms, furnished. Free heat, free light, horse. Next cut of meats, milk and cream, vegetables, and groceries at Government prices. The annual worth of his job might reach about $2,250.

Capt. Luther M. Parker, adjutant and inspector.—A youngish man from Tennessee. Salary about $1,500 per annum. Notwithstanding the fact that the captain is a handsome bachelor, he has the use of a furnished house of about seven rooms all by himself. He has, of course, free heat and free light. What other perquisites he enjoys we are unable to say, but of course he eats same as other men, probably in some special mess where they may come in for the next choice of meat cuts and such like. Probably his perquisites are equal to his salary.

Rev. J. Martyn Neifert, chaplain.—About $150 per month. House eight or nine rooms and usual facilities; said to be a popular man.

Capt. A. W. Bartel, senior assistant surgeon.—Salary, etc., $2,000. Has furnished rooms for housekeeping in hospital building.

It must be understood that all of these private dwellings in the home are well provided with baths, hot and cold water, with regulation toilet facilities, sanitary in all respects. That the private members on the governor's special staff, otherwise known as the "dump brigade," clean daily all refuse and accumulation from kitchens, and other dirt.

The hospital staff includes three young men (single men), who have quarters in the hospital building and are in a special mess with other drug men. The "practice" goes largely by "numbers," and the sailing is usually easy and unruffled, with frequent chances for "cat naps" in midday. Old soldiers, as a rule, are supposed to have and hold the same line of ailments, however. An occasional amputation varies the monotony of hospital practice for the young M. D.'s.

Mr. Ideal, chief engineer.—A young civilian; occupies a seven or eight room house; free heat, free light, commissary prices. Probably $1,800 or $2,000 man.

Mr. Long, a department head.—Young civilian; lives in a six or seven room house; free heat, free light, commissary prices. Likely a $1,200 man.

Home hotel and home restaurant buy their supplies from the home commissary at home prices. These two places are run for profit and not for unselfish purposes.

Noncommissioned officers' mess of about 60 members, who have the right of buying in the home commissary.

Now, this is the biography of the man in the home, the "old soldiers" toward whom the country is displaying its appreciation.

Private Shorty, Company Q, Two hundredth Indiana Volunteers.—This biography, history, and information would not be complete without some reference to the aforesaid soldier; in fact, there are several hundreds of "Shorties" in this camp.

He comes from Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and from all over this vast land which his valor and patriotism annealed into the greatest Government on the face of the earth. Shorty has always been very modest about his claims on this Nation; in fact, he has almost let his mortgage right go by default.

In view of the number of families and people who seem to have, hold, and enjoy rights of priority in the commissary department as to first cuts of all meats, milk and cream, vegetables, and groceries, the "Shorties" in this institution, when seated in the general mess hall, are always "short" on choice cuts, fresh vegetables, and such like, all of which are bought for and charged to their account. Somebody seems to think that canned goods, old, rotten potatoes, and roasted bones, gristle, scraps, cheapest dried fruits which Hampton can scrape up, and everything of the cheapest grade will do to throw to these old American soldiers.

What a wonderful reading to our old boys in blue the Gettysburg bill of fare, for instance, the Fourth of July "eatings"—puffed rice, fried eggs, fried bacon, creamed potatoes, chicken fricassee, peas, corn, ice cream, cakes, cigars, fresh bread, coffee, iced tea, salmon salad, macaroni and cheese—and for the other days, beefsteak, fried onions, sliced tomatoes, roast beef, mashed potatoes, boiled rice and milk, rice pudding, baked sweet potatoes, and other "cookings" equally as good will be served. Mr. Shorty, if those eatables can be served at Gettysburg, they can likewise be served on the tables of your general mess hall; you must get busy and go back into politics, get your committees, get your leaders, get your hands on the parasites and leeches, if you would go out and leave the institution, what use would there be for the "first-cuts-and-milk-and-cream people"?

Mr. Shorty, what does the average mechanic, clerk, and bookkeeper make? Anywhere from $500 to $800 per annum, out of which he must pay rent, doctors' bills, light and heat, and also full market price for all cuts of meats, milk and cream, vegetables, and groceries. And now, Mr. Shorty, why should not Gov. Knox pay rent for his 12-room house and cream, vegetables, and groceries in the outside markets, paying full price, just the same as all American citizens are now doing? Why should not his staff do the same thing? Why should this extra money be given to these people when all the camp "Shorties" are compelled to be satisfied with boiled and roasted bones, gristle, scraps, old rotten potatoes, and the very cheapest grades of canned and dried fruits and vegetables? What wonderful services has Gov. Knox and his staff rendered in order to entitle them to more than double pay? Not in saving this Nation. Not because they are experts; Lord save the mark. Could these people make such big money outside of this camp? Not on your life, Shorty; they would get lost in the great American scramble for wealth and existence; yet perforce they must be taken care of, and that at your detriment mainly. Shorty, your comfort, health, and rights requires that the kitchen be remodeled with modern appliances, up-to-date service in preparing the meals, with the best meats—no cuts out—fresh vegetables, first-class groceries, and all the necessary "fixings" in order to furnish palatable and nutritious food for men whose ages range from 65 to 85 years of age. You are entitled to all this and more, while Gov. Knox and his staff are not entitled to what they receive in pay and perquisites. Shorty, these conditions are an outrage on you. You are not the slave of the Board of Managers and Gov. Knox. Your rights are inherent and theirs are not. They are your servants and not your masters.

ONE PRIVATE SHORTY.

ALL APPEALING TO CONGRESS.

[From the Westgate News.]

The following able analysis of conditions at the homes is being mailed to Senators and Representatives in Congress:

DEAR SIR: Believing you to be an honorable, public-spirited man with the good of your constituents and your country's interests at heart, I am taking the liberty of addressing to you this communication, asking for your help and cooperation in a matter of the most vital interest and importance to not only my comrades here in misery with myself, but also for our grand country at large.

The subject I respectfully wish to call your attention to is an old one, which has been clamoring for the attention of Congress for these many years and which has to do with the National Homes for the Disabled Volunteer Soldiers being administered by a close corporation known as the board of managers and brought into existence by an act of Congress of March 21, 1866.

Now, honorable sir, while I, or anyone else for that matter, have never had the slightest doubt that the people of this glorious Republic, through their Representatives in Congress, had, because of their wonderful generosity and love of justice and fair play, provided the national homes for the succor and treatment of the valiant men now suffering from the disabilities their valor and patriotism had brought upon them, which made this Commonwealth possible, yet the wisdom of giving the power to a close corporation to administer the affairs of the soldiers' homes is questioned by a great number of people. Experience has proven beyond a shadow of doubt that the experiment has proven to be an absolute failure. The truth of this Congress and the people as a whole know very little, if anything, about, for the reason that the board of managers have in the dark but have actually been able to defeat, through their supporters in Congress, every effort to deprive them of their power.

The board of managers, although they pose in public as being great love and labor patriots, serving the veterans free gratis, have again and again, as indicated by the discussion on the floor of Congress, resisted every attempt to demote them or even to reduce their number. This is evidenced by the fact that only last summer a Member of Congress made the direct charge that the board had been maintaining a lobby for that very purpose.

To demonstrate to you, honorable sir, how subtly the board of managers, through their satellites in these so-called homes, operate to mislead the people at large and Congress regarding the character of these homes, I want to respectfully refer you to the report of the board of managers, to the last one available. This report itself is so misleading and the data so subtly arranged and cunningly devised, with the express purpose, I take it, of hiding the facts, that it required several men with the aid of an expert accountant to delve through the maze of figures in order to get at their meaning. Even then it proved to be the hardest problem in the world to ascertain; for instance, just what the board spent, or squandered, in the different departments of the homes. We tried hard to figure out just what amount the board had disbursed for supplying the public with scenery, but we discovered that instead of itemizing that account, as they did in the case of some other insignificant ones, they merely included the cost of maintenance of scenery with the item of farm upkeep, thereby making the home farms the goats for their (the board's) extravagance.

Here I want to give you the result of the figures deduced. The total expenditures for the maintenance of all of the home farms (for the period before stated) were $152,350.55. The total receipts were $68,600.39, which shows, as nearly as we are able to estimate, scenery furnished the public at the expense of the veterans' rations and other necessary comforts was, to be exact, 55.6 per cent of the total expenditures. No wonder the home farms show such an enormous loss each year.

What is the object of squandering that money for something the veterans never asked for? Why, for no other purpose than just to fool the people into believing that the homes as operated by the board are the grandest places in the world.

But the figures given above are not a drop in the bucket as compared to the initial cost of scenery, such as the approaches and surroundings of these homes, which make the veritable show places. The fine landscapes embellished with beautiful flower gardens, tropical palms, growing shrubbery, and fine trees presents an animated view of scenic splendor to the eye of the visitor as he approaches the wonderfully constructed, gigantic buildings, whose architectural dimensions are a marvel to behold. It is just as a poor, sick, and emaciated, half-starved veteran remarked in answer to a visitor's comment on the beautiful surroundings, "We can't eat those things; it's only done to fool the public."

It should not be implied, however, that the veterans do not enjoy or appreciate the beautiful and artistic. But they do insist that the veterans are entitled to have their welfare and comforts looked after first, which is not done, as is evidenced by the fact that the board insists on pursuing a mad policy of so-called economy in furnishing the food supply and in the sanitary arrangements of the buildings, which are generally infested with rats, mice, bedbugs, cockroaches, and other vermin too numerous to mention, all of which tends to keep the suffering veterans (especially in the home hospitals) in deadly fear of being attacked by the rats and bedbugs, which frequently happens.

As a matter of fact, these so-called soldiers' homes which the people and Congress intended should be real homes have, in fact, degenerated under the careful, economical, and sympathetic administration of the board into a veritable semimilitary prison or detention barracks in which the men who have offered their very lives for their country are deprived not only of their liberty by means of a "card-pass" system, much akin to the prison trusty's, but they are forced to eke out a cheap and miserable existence on 5 or 6 cent meals in overcrowded, ill-ventilated, unsanitary, and bare barrack rooms in which are not even provided the common privacies usually found in the cheapest lodging houses (known as "flop-houses") in all of our large cities.

But, asking your kind indulgence further, and hoping you will bear with me on account of the necessary length of this horrible tale of woe, and assuring you the while that it is not taken from some obscure work of fiction, or from the history of life in Libby Prison, or anything of that sort, but being merely an attempt on my part to make a plain and unvarnished statement of facts born of actual experience of life in these so-called soldiers' homes, most of the truth of which can be easily verified by a perusal of the findings and reports to Congress of the senatorial Committee on Military Affairs of their investigation of the Santa Monica Soldiers' Home in California on November 19, 1912, and entitled "Report No. 1107, Calendar No. 1034," to which I most respectfully wish to refer you.

However, continuing my story to show you how well we, the veterans, are loved and taken care of by the board, headed by that noblest and most patriotic of all men called Maj. Wadsworth, who deliberately insulted the veterans by making the statement to the honorable senatorial investigating committee (see p. 1173 of their report), "That you gentlemen"—meaning the committee—"must not think that because a man is a soldier he is a good man. You know in the Army a good deal of the scum got in toward the end" (meaning the Civil War). I have no doubt that the major meant to include himself in that statement, as he went in on the last call.

According to the regulations as laid down by the board of managers, no man is admitted to these homes unless he is totally disabled and needs medical treatment. So, of course, a medical staff dispenses the treatment, which, though, is about as poor as can be imagined. The so-called physicians are in most cases very poorly paid, inexperienced, incompetent, and inefficient, who strut through the sick wards of the hospitals attired like the military satraps that they try to imitate, making their calls in the most perfunctory manner possible, and paying but little heed or attention to the needs of the patients.

Medicines which are prescribed to relieve the suffering veterans are allowed to constantly run out of stock and dopes substituted, which sometimes do more harm than good. Opiates that are habit producing are administered sometimes without the slightest compunction—and then people will wonder where the dope fiends come from.

Frequently the nursing is done by poorly paid, inefficient, careless nurses, who are not at all interested in their work or in the welfare of their patients, because, as is the case at the B. M. S., they come here and get disgusted with the liberty-depriving discipline and insane arbitrary rules laid down for their conduct, not only during duty hours, but when they are off duty as well, which is certainly getting to the extreme. Good, self-respecting nurses remain but a short time and leave in disgust, making frequent changes of nurses necessary, to the detriment of the patients.

There seems to be an entire absence of that friendly spirit and feeling of good will or any feeling of cordiality between the veterans of the homes and the officers and civilian employees. The employees and officers seem to look down upon the veterans as though they were paupers and deserving no better treatment than they see fit to dole out to them. Whenever an opportunity presents itself, they seem only too glad to enforce some tyrannical, unreasonable, and oftentimes arbitrary rule or regulation laid down by themselves and the board. Most of these rules were promulgated for the government of the homes some 20 or 30 years ago, when the conditions to be met were entirely different from those of the present, and which, if strictly enforced, inflicts a positive hardship on the veterans. It actually seems that most of the officers delight in a nonenforcement of any and all regulations that happen to favor the veterans.

To show how very considerate and sympathetic the president of the board is toward the Spanish War veterans now coming into the homes, I have the honor to refer you to his statement as made under oath to the honorable senatorial committee investigating the Santa Monica Home (see p. 1175 of their report), which is as follows:

"Maj. WADSWORTH. We are getting from the Spanish War men probably their worst class; the men who by their overindulgences have made themselves incompetent to take care of themselves. With very few exceptions, the class of Spanish War men we are getting are very poor."

There you have it—a statement that is nothing but a deliberate slander and falsehood, and the honorable senatorial committee ought to have prosecuted that man Wadsworth for perjury, because just the opposite is the truth. As a class, the Spanish War veterans now in the homes are on the whole and with few exceptions as decent, self-respecting, and patriotic a set of men as can be found anywhere; men who have seen the hardest service in this country and in the Tropics, which has incapacitated them so they have to seek refuge in the homes. But these men have aroused the hostility of the president of the board because they have in a measure been able to fight back, and to show up the outrageous conditions prevailing in these so-called homes. The Spanish War veterans are satisfied that if the Santa Monica investigation did not accomplish another single thing, it surely unmasked that man Wadsworth, the would-be love-labor patriot.

Another one of the most reprehensible things the board inflicts on the veterans is in the manner of employment in these homes. Regulation No. 314 provides that "Members of the home be employed as far as practical for the best interests of the homes." That regulation is and has been violated most persistently of any regulation laid down by the board. Veterans in the homes are usually given the most menial and poorest-paid positions. Most of the best-paid and desirable positions are given to civilians who never would enter the service of their country on the firing line. They are often merely political "hangers on" or relations of the powers that be in these homes. In fact, the board of managers make it their business (because of the great consideration they have for the veterans) to exploit and slave them to death. Their infirmities force them to take refuge in the homes, which make them easy victims for exploitation purposes. For example, civilian employees are paid from $25 to $250 per month, while veterans are forced to accept jobs that only pay as low as $7 to $35. To give you a correct idea as to what extent the veterans are being exploited, I beg leave to refer you to the board of managers' report to Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, page 203 (which is the last one available), and which gives the cost of labor at the Battle Mountain Sanitarium. The number of members employed was 277, to whom was paid the munificent sum of $8,789.47. The total number of civilians employed was 299, to whom was paid $43,324.24. So, while they had employed 22 more civilians than veterans, yet the civilians were paid $34,324.24 more. In other words, the total expenditures for salaries to both veterans and civilians employed were $52,113.17. Out of this the veterans received only 17 per cent, while the civilians were paid 83 per cent. Yet the board has the effrontery and unmitigated gall to pretend that they are giving the veterans in these homes a square deal, when, as a matter of fact, the general treasurer of the board, testifying at the Santa Monica investigation, admitted under oath (see p. 1156 of the committee report) that the wages paid to veterans were less than one-third that paid to civilians. Maj. Wadsworth, president of the board, also admitted under oath (see pp. 1157–1158) that the officers of the homes always requested him to get rid of the veterans and give the positions to civilians, showing how the veterans are always discriminated against in direct violation of regulation No. 314, and excusing this action when pressed by the committee by stating that they could not get enough veterans who were competent to do the work. As a matter of fact, the satellites of the board of managers in these homes turn down the application of both old and young veterans for positions nearly every day. Not only is this a fact, but if the board really wanted to do right by the veterans, they could get from the ranks of the old and young veterans' organizations, such as the Grand Army of the Republic and United Spanish War Veterans, men competent enough to fill every position in every soldiers' home in the land, from governor down to common laborer. Then, why don't they do it? Will Maj. Wadsworth quit handing out the usual line of patriotic bunk long enough to answer the question? But no; the board of managers would rather break all world's records by preserving a policy of so-called economy which imposes sweat-shop, labor-exploiting conditions on the veterans in these so-called homes, while they, the board, travel about the country on their so-called inspection tours in regal style in Pullman palace cars, piling up expense accounts that are staggering, and with no one to say to them nay, notwithstanding the fact that they force the poor, sick, emaciated veterans who are transferred from one home to another to travel a great distance in day coaches and without even providing them with coffee money. Contrast that sort of treatment to the ample provisions that are made for civilian employees traveling on home business, whom they allow 7 cents a mile and all expenses while en route. Right here another question suggests itself. Were these homes built for the benefit of the board of managers and their satellites or for the veterans who have made them possible? Which?

Now, I could go on indefinitely and relate to you the terrible abuses and outrages that we veterans are subjected to constantly. My own personal experiences since I have been forced to seek refuge in these homes has been sad to say the least. The charges that I make against the powers that be I can substantiate in every particular, if given an opportunity by Congress. Thousands of my suffering comrades stand ready to corroborate me. But none of us will, I am sure, have anything more whatever to do with the board of managers and their fake investigators, who always use the whitewash brush and then often summarily expel us from the homes for having the temerity to expose the misconduct of their incompetent parasites mismanaging these homes.

Congress has the power to make these places of refuge for the veterans real homes. This they should do forthwith by acting on the recommendation of the honorable Senate Committee on Military Affairs, which found the conditions of the Santa Monica Home as bad, if not worse, than I have stated them to be.

The board of managers stands tried and convicted before the whole world on every count—among them being the following: Starvation and improper rations; exploitation and sweat-shop labor conditions; wanton waste and extravagance; incompetency; inefficiency; criminal carelessness and indifference on the part of the medical staff; rank injustice and discrimination; vacillating procrastination; brutality and extreme cruelty and neglect; and last, but not least, suggestions of graft—and plenty of them, too.

In closing, the question suggests itself: Can Congress afford to ignore the demands of the Nation's defenders and force them to appeal to the public and the press to help them in their fight for justice and the real homes in fact? I hope not. Therefore I and all of my comrades beg and beseech you to cooperate with all these honorable men in Congress and give the problem your immediate attention.

And so, awaiting your pleasure, for which please accept my thanks in advance, I beg to remain,

Yours, for the Nation's defenders,

ONE OF THE BOYS OF '98.

SAWTELLE, CAL.

The revelations made of the treatment of veterans at the soldiers' homes will doubtless be startling to Members of Congress. That at the will of any one man decrepit old veterans, without a cent with which to buy themselves food to keep them alive, are thrown upon the street is almost past belief. But it is even so, and this abuse of power has been going on for years. Hundreds of old men have been "given the gate" in recent years.

It is wrong that such power should be placed in the hands of one man. No man is big enough to exercise arbitrary power over so large a body of men, and many men are small enough to use the power to wreak their revenge upon the helpless veterans.

In no case should one of these veterans be cast out upon the world. The United States recognizes its liability for their support. That is what these homes are for. They were not established to give positions to politicians where they may lord it over the Nation's wards. In the Regular Army, perhaps, arbitrary power may be necessary, but it is not so in the soldiers' homes. These should be, in fact as well as in name, homes for the veterans.

It is true that some of these men become insubordinate at times and in need of restraint. They are old, many of them may be cranky, and some of them are addicted to drink. There must be rules for their restraint and penalties for the infraction of the rules, but in no case should they be thrown from the home. There should be detention quarters where they may be held in case of violation of the rules, and perhaps other mild punishment should be permitted, but always they should be retained at the home unless their offense has been so great as to require their being turned over to the county authorities.

When a helpless and penniless veteran is turned out to be dependent upon charity or to starve, as was the case with Marcus Sylvester, who was "given the gate" for merely suspecting that his pension had been withheld by the officers, a crime has been committed.

The punishment of "giving a man the gate" at the national soldiers' homes has been abused about as much as the Czar's prerogative of banishing subjects to Siberia.

For two or three years past Congress has been hearing complaints of the harsh treatment of veterans by officers of soldiers' homes. Many have come to the conclusion that the veterans who are forced to find refuge there are not made to feel that it is what its name indicates and what the Government meant that it should be—a home.

The great trouble appears to be that a few of the officers of the home are austere in their temperament and treat the inmates with harshness unwarranted by the positions they hold. There appears to be a disposition among the officers to regard the inmates as charity patients and to subject them to such rigorous treatment as even young men of the Regular Army grow restive under.

An immediate change is necessary. These veterans are growing old and most of them are in poor health. They are not charity patients, but have earned by their past service to the country the best care that can be given them.

They should have over them, not white-gloved martinets of whom they are taught to stand in awe, but friendly officers who, though firm in requiring compliance with necessary rules, have hearts filled with sympathy for the veterans and with respect for the great work they did for their country, and who will make them feel that the institution is indeed a home for them. They should have a kind smile and words of cheer instead of the frosty attitude of a superior officer to an underling. And when some veteran, a victim of mental or physical weakness perhaps, does transgress the rules of the home, he should be given a helping and a restraining hand, instead of "the gate" and possible starvation and death.

The placing of these homes under the administration of the War Department, with an executive authority responsible to Congress and to the people, is the remedy for present evils.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for the managers of the soldiers' homes. But in view of the statements made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], it might be well for me to make some statement in regard to them.

The Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Homes is composed of men who are Republicans and ex-Union soldiers. Most of them have been appointed on the board upon the recommendation of the committee of which the gentleman from Kansas is a member.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. VAUGHAN). The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-nine Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN and Mr. GARNER) there were 5 ayes and 81 noes.

Mr. MANN and Mr. GARNER asked for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. GILLETT as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 11 ayes and 96 noes.

So the motion that the committee rise was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will proceed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I was stating when the gentleman from Illinois, in order that I might have a quorum to listen to my interesting remarks, made the point of no quorum that the Board of Managers of the National Soldiers' Homes consists of men who are all Republicans, and who have served with distinction in the Union Army. That board is composed of Maj. James W. Wadsworth, president, for 18 or 20 years a distinguished Member of this House; Lieut. Franklin Murphy, first vice president, who served as governor of the State of New Jersey; Col. Henry K. Markham, of Pasadena, Cal.; John M. Holley, of Wisconsin; Maj. William Warner, of Kansas City, Mo., who served in the United States Senate; Col. Edwin C. Hammond, of Indiana; Gen. Joseph S. Smith, of Maine; Lieut. Oscar M. Gottschall, of Dayton, Ohio; and Capt. Lucien S. Lambert, of Galesburg, Ill.

These men all served in the Civil War, and their sympathies are with the Union soldiers and other veterans of wars who, through one misfortune or another, are compelled to live in the national soldiers' homes. These men are all Republicans, of the same political faith as is the gentleman from Kansas.

In the sundry civil appropriation act of the current year this provision was inserted:

Hereafter vacancies occurring in the membership of the Board of Managers in the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall not be filled until the whole number of members of such board are reduced to five, and thereafter the whole number of members constituting that board shall not exceed five.

In the last Congress this House passed a resolution providing for the filling of all vacancies in the Loard. Three of the men named in the resolution were Democrats and one was a Republican. The resolution did not pass the Senate. The Senate was Republican, and the failure to pass the resolution perpetuated in office the Republicans whose terms had expired. There is pending here in the House a resolution to fill the existing vacancies. I think there are four Democrats named in the resolution. If the conditions could possibly be anything like those described by the gentleman from Kansas, he should welcome the substitution of these Democrats for the Republican members on the board. I do not believe that any such situation exists.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Did not the distinguished president of that board, who served here as our colleague for many years, Mr. Wadsworth, indorse and recommend that the board should be reduced to five members, instead of the unwieldy and unsatisfactory number that now makes up the board of managers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. What salary is paid to the members of the board?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The president gets $4,000 a year. I do not think the others are paid.

Mr. GOULDEN. The others are not paid.

Mr. GARNER. It is merely an honorary and political position.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not a political position.

Mr. GARNER. They undertake to take care of the political positions of the homes.

Mr. GOULDEN. I would not go that far; I think that is a mistake. Politics plays no part in the action of the board.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The number of members on the board, as it was constituted, was equal to the number of national homes and one more. So the practice has been for each member on the board to act as a general custodian of one particular home, and then one man was left as president of the board. The complaint has been made by the president of the board himself that under such a system it was difficult, if not impossible, to have a board action taken with reference to any particular home, because, as each member of the board was in charge of a particular home, whatever he recommended the others were likely to acquiesce in. And so the president of the board, Maj. Wadsworth, has from time to time recommended that the board be reduced in number so as to disassociate from the members of the board that local attachment that has existed.

The gentleman from Kansas states there has been a failure to pass the resolution here because it is to perpetuate Maj. Wadsworth in the board. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that under the legislation enacted by Congress the vacancies occurring hereafter by which the board is to be reduced makes it probable that Maj. Wadsworth will be one of the first to leave the board. From what I know of him, from my service with him in the House and my knowledge of his career both as a soldier and a public servant and a private citizen, I believe that it will be a great misfortune to the ex-soldiers of this country when the time comes that he is eliminated from the board. [Applause.]

From time to time complaints are made about the character of the food furnished to men in the soldiers' homes. I asked some questions relative to such complaints. Maj. Harris said:

There are always some complaints, but we have endeavored to improve the messing somewhat. There is a sentiment among the patriotic people for the old soldiers, and they say that nothing is too good for them. We can not go entirely on that basis, but we endeavor to conduct the home—

He was here interrupted by the chairman, and I will read further from the hearings and what Mr. Wadsworth said:

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). What is the character of food furnished them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For instance, here is the bill of fare at the Pacific Branch, Sunday, for breakfast: Beef stew with garden vegetables, graham and white bread, oleo, and coffee. Dinner: Roast loin of beef, sage dressing, brown gravy, mashed potatoes, cabinet pudding, cream sauce, graham and white bread, oleo, coffee. Here is printed the bill of fare for every day in the week. On Monday they had for breakfast fried ham with creamed potatoes, graham and white bread, oleo, and coffee.

The CHAIRMAN. You have visited all these branches?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes, sir; many times.

The CHAIRMAN. How is the food prepared?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is mostly steam cooked, but it is prepared in a wholesome, clean way. Mr. FITZGERALD, and there is no real cause of complaint. But when you are feeding 17,000 men, coming from all sections of the country, accustomed to different kinds of homes and different kinds of cooking—New England cooking being different from western cooking, and so on—it is very hard to please every one of them, and three or four men in a home can raise more trouble by writing to Representatives and Senators and to magazines and various newspapers than you can imagine; and yet with all that, I claim that not over one-half of 1 per cent of the members make complaints.

Taking 17,000 as the basis, 1 per cent would be 170, and one-half of 1 per cent would be 85, which would be about 20 members to a home, and I do not think there are that number who comprise the grumblers and the growlers. I do not believe you can find 17,000 men in any walk of life any more contented or happier than these men. It is almost impossible to make a man 80 years old happy and contented in every way. He either has lumbago or rheumatism or some trouble with his digestion, and when you come to Spanish War veterans you have another class of men to deal with; they are tubercular to a very large extent and the very nature of the disease makes them restless and dissatisfied. They will be at one place and will think that if they could go somewhere else they would get well, and when they get there they want to go somewhere else. I think their complaints are mostly owing to the nature of their disease more than anything else, and I pity them very much; and when you think of the very small number of complaints you have out of 17,000 old soldiers, I think it is remarkable.

Mr. Chairman, from time to time gentlemen have made criticisms of the board. I do not say that the board is above criticism or that things do not happen in the conduct of the soldiers' homes which ought to be criticized, but I express the opinion, based on information gathered and investigations made over a course of eight or nine years and my knowledge of the character of men who are serving on the board, and from the fact that the board is composed of men who have served in the Union Army, that the board is interested only in the welfare of the men, and that these homes are and have been well managed on the whole.

Of course, some of us understand the reason for the complaint of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. He has had a grievance against the president of the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Homes for a great many years. He has been dissatisfied with the conduct of these homes because the board of managers declined to expend from $60,000 to $70,000 to equip the national soldiers' home at Leavenworth, in the gentleman's own district, so that it may burn coal produced in that district rather than conduct the home more economically by burning oil. At the request of the gentleman from Kansas, two investigations were made this year to ascertain the facts. These investigations were made by impartial persons, so that there could be no conflict between the committee and the gentleman from Kansas. One investigation was made by the Bureau of Mines, and the other by the Quartermaster General's Department of the Army, and both of the reports sustained the contention made on this floor in other sessions by the members of this committee, based upon the information that this committee had obtained, that it would cost the sum of money I have stated to equip the plant there for the economical and proper consumption of coal, and that when that was done there would be no economy in burning coal instead of oil. I suggest that criticisms from such a source are not entitled to the same weight as criticisms from a disinterested source.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. ANTHONY. If I can show that the gentleman, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, was deceived by the board of managers last year in the estimate they submitted to the committee for fuel at Leavenworth, will he admit that I had cause for complaint?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will not; but if the gentleman can satisfy me that the report made by the inspector sent out by the Director of the Bureau of Mines and the report made by the Army officers attached to the Quartermaster's Corps at Fort Leavenworth are incorrect, and do not sustain the contention made by the board of managers and advocated by the Committee on Appropriations, then I will be content to agree with the gentleman.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Has the gentleman been informed yet that the board of managers asked about $43,000 for fuel at the Leavenworth home last year, and has the committee been informed as yet that after stating that would be sufficient the board of managers came back for a deficiency of $6,000; and then that the report of the inspector at the War Department shows that the board took $8,000 of money out of the post fund, supposed to be used for the benefit and amusement of the soldiers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We know that the appropriation for fuel was insufficient.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why will the committee stand for that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. And that does not justify the contention of the gentleman that it would have been cheaper to burn coal.

Mr. ANTHONY. That will take quite a while to explain, and I will undertake to do that under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We will be very glad to meet the time when the gentleman advances it. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time, however, that the gentleman's criticism has been directed at the board for its treatment of the old soldiers, and in view of what has happened in the past it seems to me that any facts that might justify a motive for this criticism might properly accompany the criticism itself, so that those who are impartial and who wish to know the facts and to do only that which is right and just can take such action as will be conducive to the best interests and contentment of these soldiers.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a great light has at last penetrated the darkness and gloom that has so long enshrouded the great blessings that the Democratic administration has brought to this Nation. These blessings are here in unmeasured abundance, but the people of this Nation do not know it. They ought to rejoice and be happy, but their minds are in such state that they can not. But at last the truth is out. Men are out of work. The unemployed number millions. This is at last admitted, but the President assures us that this panic is "psychological." Business is bad, when it ought to be good. Of course there is nothing the matter with the Democratic theories or with the Democratic legislation. It is only that the business men of the Nation are too stupid to comprehend this beneficence. But the "psychological" condition that has permeated the White House has not yet reached the majority in Congress.

We have been told day after day that business is good—never better; that there is no depression; that there are no closed mills, and that there are no idle men, by our friends on that side of the House. But now the President admits that business depression is widespread and universal throughout the country.

In the sacred name of outraged virtue, with all the solemnity that my lacerated feelings will permit, I want to protest against this reflection by the President upon that tireless oratorical demonstrator of efficiency, that vocal creator of imaginary prosperity, that circulating vocabulary of the administration, that suave sophist, the radiant and serene Hon. William C. Redfield. What is the use of this optimistic spouter of twisted figures, that never met a truth that he could not strangle nor a fact that he could not vanquish, daily performing throughout the country, demonstrating by doctored reports of discredited "experts" and by specially prepared statistics our unexampled prosperity, if even the President will not believe him?

Again I protest against the President contradicting that sedate and retiring gentleman who, when other matters do not interfere, presides over the deliberate deliberations of that other legislative White House annex at the other end of this Capitol.

The other day, when having his hand properly held in a beauty parlor, this modest man shrinkingly declared that this Nation was splendidly prosperous and business universally good. What a fascinating female that must have been to make the world look so rosy to our own Thomas Riley. But in all fairness let it be said that the prosperity ecstasies enjoyed by our brilliant and voluble Vice President on that auspicious occasion were in all probability mostly "psychological." Why should the President contradict such prophets of prosperity as Marshall and Redfield, especially when all three look upon the same facts from the same angle and inspired by a common hope.

But this "psychological" condition makes clear many things we could not understand a few days ago. "Then when we saw as through a glass darkly, and now see face to face."

A few days ago we were informed that unless we surrendered our control over the Panama Canal and gave other nations the fruit of our labors that something awful would happen. The President said he would not know what to do in things of "nearer consequence." The awful thing that was to happen has not happened. We now learn that no nation was protesting against the canal law. We have it upon the high authority of the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate that no nation is protesting and that no nation has protested against the present law; that no nation has ever asked or is asking now that it be changed. What, then, was it that so filled the President with dread and fear that he pleaded with Congress to do this astounding and cowardly thing, "right or wrong"? No one knows. The only explanation the present reveals is that it was a "psychological" condition, a state of mind, an unsubstantial dream, and not a real danger that threatened us.

A few days ago the President refused, as he had refused a year ago, to go to Arlington on that sacred day when a grateful Nation pays its tribute of loving remembrance to its heroic dead. An invitation was extended to the patriotic Speaker of this House to be the orator on that occasion. Then the President, without knowing of this invitation to the Speaker and without communicating the fact to either the members of the Grand Army of the Republic or the newspapers, suddenly changed his mind. True, this was a strange and striking coincident, but no doubt the real explanation is that it was "psychological."

It was no doubt the same thing that caused the President, after repeated urgings by Democratic friends, to change his attitude and be present at the Gettysburg reunion of a year ago.

A few days ago we practically declared war against an individual, not because American citizens had been murdered, not because millions of American property had been destroyed, but because he persisted in firing 5 rounds in salute instead of 21. I can not understand why the President and Huerta did not compromise on the magic 13. Then one of the mightiest battleship squadrons of the world was rushed to the coast of Mexico to blockade her ports, and Vera Cruz was seized to prevent the landing of a cargo containing munitions of war by a German ship. In this undertaking 17 brave American soldiers gave up their lives in the heroic performance of duty. A few days ago this same ship unloaded this same cargo unmolested, and these same guns, shotted with the same ammunition, are ready to be turned upon American soldiers.

We are informed that ammunition is still, with the knowledge and consent of the administration, being sent to the Mexican rebels. We are informed that two vessels have, with the knowledge of the Secretary of State, sailed for Tampico loaded with guns and other war material, and that these are to be permitted to reach Villa and his band of bandits and assassins. More bullets that may rend the flesh of American soldiers. Let us in charity hope that these things are not criminal blunders but only "psychological" mistakes.

I hold in my hand a copy of the New York Sun of to-day, and I read the following dispatch, which is quoted in one of the editorials of that paper:

Much relief was manifested in official circles when it was learned to-day that Huerta has backed down from his plan to blockade Tampico. It obviates the necessity of the United States showing its hand in favor of the constitutionalists.

I have wondered why the administration is so careful about publicly showing its hand in favor of the constitutionalists. I am reliably informed that a day or two ago the newspaper correspondents had an interview with Charles Douglas, who is the attorney of the constitutionalists, who received that position largely because of the fact that he is a friend of the Secretary of State, and when these newspaper men assembled to receive information in regard to the constitutionalists Mr. John Lind, the man who had been the special representative of the President of the United States in Mexico, was there, advising the attorney of the constitutionalists what he should say and what he should give out to the newspapers.

What closer connection do you want between the rebels and this administration—the President's special representative to Mexico a short time ago, now the adviser of the attorney who represents these so-called constitutionalists?

Let us see if this business depression, which the President at last admits, is a "psychological" condition or an ugly fact. Since the Democratic Party went into power the business of this Nation has decreased more than 40 per cent. Last April the balance of trade against us was more than $10,000,000, the first time it has been against us since the old Wilson-Gorman law was struck from the statute books. On the 15th day of last month 238,000 railroad cars were standing idle, the largest number in the history of the Nation.

I hold here a clipping from yesterday's Post of this city, and I will read a line or two from it:

WORKERS FOR HIGHER RATE—RAILROADS, LAYING OFF THOUSANDS OF MEN, NEED IT, SAYS LABOR LEADER.

NEW YORK, June 6, 1914.

A Washington dispatch to the New York Times says:

"Railroad workers, as well as railroad owners, favor the 5 per cent rate increase asked by the roads, according to Fred L. Feick, of the western railroad employees, who is in Washington to testify on the subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Mr. Feick said that his organization included 1,000,000 men. While they do not advocate a particular increase, he said they feel that a fair share in business should be permitted to the roads.

"Five hundred thousand railroad men in the West are out of work," said Mr. Felck. "Men who have been engineers and conductors of 10 years' service to-day have been set back to braking, something that has never happened before. Many employees have been dismissed, and retrenchment is general in all departments. In many cases wages have been cut anywhere from 10 to 20 per cent and the hours of employment of thousands of employees have been reduced."

I wonder if the railroad men believe this is a "condition of mind"? Are these conditions simply "psychological"? Can these idle men feed themselves and their families on imagination?

Here are some more "psychological" facts: The importation of tin plate the first six months before the enactment of the present tariff law was 3,000,000 pounds. The amount imported the first six months following that law was 33,000,000 pounds—ten times as much—and valued at $1,034,000. Nor was as much tin plate used in this country the first six months' period mentioned as in the last. Of course, it is only a "psychological" fact that should alarm no one that in the tin-plate industry alone in the last six months a million dollars has been taken from American labor, from American manufacturers, sent out of the country and given to the foreigner.

Thousands of tons of foreign steel are going into the ports of San Francisco and Seattle. Thousands of tons of cotton ties made in England are going to New Orleans and Galveston. The National Tube Works, at McKeesport, Pa., employing 2,500 men, a few days ago closed. The vice president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works declared the other day that 12,000 men formerly employed in that concern are to-day walking the streets looking for work. But all this is merely "psychological."

A distinguished gentleman told me yesterday that in one industrial district in Chicago, 12 blocks long and 6 blocks wide, there were 4,000 idle men, more than one-third of the entire number that live in the district. He declared that taking the entire city of Chicago to-day that more than one-third of all the workingmen were out of employment; that they were looking for work and waiting for an opportunity to vote the Republican ticket. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The last three months of 1914 our sale of cotton goods abroad decreased $1,200,000. Our purchases abroad in the same period increased $2,100,000. Bradford, the great woolen and worsted center of England, has increased the sale to the United States of these goods since the Underwood law went into effect 280 per cent.

During the first six months of the Underwood law our foreign trade was more than a hundred million dollars less than it was under the first six months of the Payne law.

Our imports of cotton cloth the first three months of 1914 were $4,539,295; during the first three months of 1913 it was $2,407,120, or a balance in favor of the foreigner of $2,132,175. Our imports of woolen and worsted goods the first three months of 1914 were $7,664,370; the first three months of 1913 were $2,254,010, a balance in favor of the foreigner in three months of $5,410,360.

Yesterday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] entertained the House by telling them how some farmers in the northern part of his State were going to start a woolen mill. Well, if that be true, the farmers will furnish the money and the promoters will be that much richer, and in less than a year from now that stock will not be worth 10 cents on the dollar. They had better read this increase in the imports, and then figure out how they are going to be able to compete with the cheap labor in England.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is very evident to me there is not a quorum here, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman wants to make the point of no quorum, all right; but I do not yield to him to interrupt my speech.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present. It is evident that there is not a quorum present, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, and, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 246 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he reported the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee has had under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, and, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 246 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reports herewith the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have no particular desire to criticize the distinguished gentleman who shows his statesmanship every few minutes by making the point of no quorum, but it does occur to me that a majority of this House should be wildly enthusiastic for the legislation he is urging. I believe that he owes a higher duty and more respect to the great laboring interests of this country than to be constantly trying to delay the business of this House. Now, when I was interrupted I was speaking in regard to the imports in the port of New York.

During the month of March the exports at the port of New York alone decreased $11,000,000. During the month of April they decreased $12,000,000, or a loss of $23,000,000 at one port in two months. Imports increased over $26,000,000 in the same time at the same port, or a balance in favor of the foreigner of over $46,000,000 in the port of New York alone for the months of March and April, 1914, or at the rate of $276,000,000 per year. But of course all this is simply "psychological" and not facts that should alarm anyone.

This tremendous loss of trade is made much more striking when you remember that our imports of materials used in manufacturing has decreased in the first six months under the Underwood law $48,000,000. The imports of finished manufactured articles ready for sale, the value of which consists mostly of labor, increased in March alone over $8,000,000. During April, 1914, the last month for which the figures are available, as compared with April, 1913, we bought from the foreigner $36,000,000 more and sold him $37,000,000 less.

It is estimated that every million dollars' worth increase in imports and every million dollars' decrease in exports means a thousand idle men in this country. Who, then, can look at these figures and fail to understand the reason for closed mills and idle factories and the millions of unemployed? Who but the President would contend that these conditions are simply "psychological"?

The value of the stocks of this Nation has decreased $2,000,000,000 within the last six months. The business of this Nation has decreased $1,000,000 every hour that Woodrow Wilson has been in the White House. This is the result of the "new freedom." This is the practical workings of that law that was to give us the trade of the world and drive the foreigner from our market places.

Millions of dollars' worth of farm products have been bought abroad, but the cost of living has not decreased. One hundred million pounds of fresh meat has been imported under the Underwood law, but beef is 30 per cent higher to-day than it was last September, the last month of the Republican tariff law that was, according to Democratic doctrine, responsible for the high cost of living. We have free wheat; but I notice that in my own State the price of bread has been increased.

I hold here in my hand an article taken from one of the newspapers in my State—the Tacoma Tribune—which says that the bakers have raised the price of bread. The following is the article:

BAKERS RAISE PRICE OF BREAD.

The Master Bakers' Association of Washington, Tuesday morning, served formal notice on the local grocers that shortly the price of bread will be raised. When the new scale goes into effect, the grocers will receive 28 loaves of bread for $1 instead of 30 as heretofore.

E. M. Thomas, president of the Tacoma Retail Grocers' Association, received the notice; but just when the scale will go into effect is not known.

It is not believed, however, that the new scale will affect the consumer, as the bakers declare that if the grocers raise the price of the loaf the manufacturers will install delivery wagons and sell direct to the consumer.

Leading grocers declare they do not object to receiving less profit under the new order, but that they will insist that the bakers keep the weight of the bread up to the standard of 16 ounces, dough measure, and 14 ounces after baking and ready for sale.

Last September, under the Payne law, 30 loaves of bread could be bought for $1 in the State of Washington. Now you can purchase but 28 for that sum. This is the way that the Democratic Party has reduced the cost of living.

I wonder if it has ever occurred to the now terrified and discredited Democracy that all their howling about the increased cost of living caused by a protective tariff was simply a "psychological" condition, a state of a perturbed mind. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Of course, all these facts and figures, according to the President—and the rest of the Democrats of the country must accept this statement, for they permit without protest the President to do all their thinking for them—is simply "psychological." The only cure for this condition is more legislation.

We are to be kept in session all summer to cure this "psychological" condition in our efforts to place upon the statute books laws that will strangle what little business is left. It may be "psychological," but every day this Congress is in session the business of the country grows less. There is but one small consolation for the meek and cowardly way in which the Democratic majority obeys the President, resulting in keeping us here all summer, and that is that while they are destroying the business of the country they are also destroying the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Business men see their markets gone, their factories closed, but they should not complain. Let them read a chapter on the "New Freedom." [Applause on the Republican side.]

They see the foreigner with his products made by foreign cheap labor coming into this country and driving them from the market, but why should they complain. Let them read an essay on "Free Trade."

The business men of this country are daily selling less abroad, are daily selling less at home; daily the foreigner is increasing his sales in this country; but why should our business men complain? Let them listen to a lecture on "Efficiency." [Applause on the Republican side.]

The business man looks upon the closed factory, the dying fires, the idle men, the poverty, upon the vast army of unemployed, but let him be of good cheer, let him read our new "Constitution of Peace" and be comforted.

What the hungry want is not bread, but more law.

What the naked want is not more clothes, but more statutes.

What the idle need is not work, but more legislation.

What capital needs is not investment, but legal confiscation.

What the Nation needs to-day is not prosperity, but a cheerful state of mind. [Applause on the Republican side.]

What the people of this country need is the faith cure. They took it last election, and it cured their faith in the Democratic Party forever. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Poverty, want, hunger, idleness, and rags. These are not pitiful facts; these are not awful realities; these are but the figment of a fevered and uncultured imagination unable to grasp the eternal verities of the "new freedom" and the splendid truths of the new "constitution of peace."

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will yield in a moment.

Surely this Nation to-day is reaping the reward of being directed by the impractical, the dreamer, the reformer, the uplifter, the scholar, and the theorist. This is the day of the triumph of the "intellectual unintelligent."

Yes, all our troubles are "psychological." Is death by fear any more delightful than when the terror comes in any other form?

"Psychological" is a blessed word. There is none with which it can be compared. "Charity covers a multitude of sins," but "psychological" in its beneficent elasticity covers the measureless multitude of Democratic blunders. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Do I understand the gentleman to claim that the President has abandoned his old scheme by which all of these were to be overcome on the part of employers and manufacturers by sharpening their wits against the foreigner, and that now that is to be supplanted by the new psychology theory he speaks about?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The President has succeeded in having the people of this country sharpen their wits in competition with the other nations of the world. We have lost our home markets to the foreigner. Each day we import more and sell less, and now, as I said a moment ago, after he looked around upon closed mills, the 500,000 men out of employment on the railroads alone, upon the 3,000,000 of the unemployed in this country, the largest number that ever existed in the history of this Nation, it seems that that fact has just penetrated the White House, although it has not yet crossed the aisle, and then the President replies to the business men of this country, who come before him beseeching that Congress adjourn—the only blessing they could bestow upon this country—that the conditions are merely psychological; that the people of this country are not hungry, but simply imagine that they are. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, on January 17, 1914, I introduced H. R. 11808, a bill to secure cooperation between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State railway boards and commissions of the several States in correlating, changing, and establishing intrastate rates, charges, and fares which indirectly affect interstate commerce in the transportation of passengers and property by public carriers, and providing for procedure relative thereto.

I desire briefly to discuss the provisions of this bill. Section 1, in substance, provides that the Interstate Commerce Commission, through one or more of its members, may enter into a conference with any one or more State railway boards. Such boards, upon complaint of any interested party, may correlate and prepare schedules for the changing of rates for transportation of passengers and property, and in so doing may compare existing rates with State rates and also make comparisons between one or more States, and may consider ways and means of arriving at fair, reasonable, and just intrastate rates.

Section 2 provides, in substance, that when any interested party files a complaint concerning any existing or proposed interstate schedule with the Interstate Commerce Commission, then any State board, whose State rates may be affected thereby, may intervene and be heard, and when any matters are pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission affecting intrastate rates any State board may intervene and introduce evidence and arguments in support of the State rates.

Section 3 provides, in substance, that any interested party may file a complaint with any State railway board, pursuant to the laws of such State, concerning any proposed intrastate rates which indirectly affect interstate commerce, or when such State board proposes, on its own initiative, any such intrastate schedule of rates the Interstate Commerce Commission may, upon request of such State board, participate in such proceedings by conferring through one or more of its members with such State railway board. It may make suggestions and proposals concerning such matters pending before such State board and through such request may submit evidence and present arguments relative to such matters.

Section 4 allows the Interstate Commerce Commission to adopt reasonable administrative rules and regulations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act and for facilitating the joint conferences and action of and between State railway boards and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and for that purpose may fix the time and place of meetings in which State boards may participate.

Section 5 provides in substance that the Interstate Commerce Commission and State railway boards participating in such joint conferences, if empowered by the laws of their respective States, may make their respective tentative findings and conclusions; the Interstate Commerce Commission as to interstate and the State boards as to intrastate schedules. But none of such findings or conclusions of the Interstate Commerce Commission nor of the State boards shall have any binding force or effect until ratified by the Interstate Commerce Commission acting independently of each of the participating State boards. Upon the submission of such findings and conclusions for ratification the Interstate Commerce Commission may permit interested parties to be heard upon such ratification, and when ratified shall be binding as to interstate rates, and when ratified by the State boards shall be binding as to State rates.

Section 6 provides in substance that the Interstate Commerce Commission may, if permitted by the laws of the State, appear before the State board of any State upon any matter affecting interstate rates and may adduce and submit evidence in support of its contention upon such hearing.

Section 7 provides in substance that the Interstate Commerce Commission or any State railway board may separately ratify the joint action of such boards, and when so ratified it shall constitute a final adjudication.

Section 8 provides in substance that any one or more of the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission may be delegated by the commission to attend any joint meeting or conference with any one or more of the State railway boards, and the action of such representative may be ratified or rejected by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This bill seeks to bring together the Interstate Commerce Commission and the different State railway boards for unity of action in establishing just and reasonable rates for transportation of persons and property.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is the representative of the national power, while the State railway board is the representative of the power of the State, the one possessing power over interstate commerce while the other retains power over intrastate commerce. Under our complex system of Government there is a constant conflict between the National and the State powers. One frequently trespasses on the other and often the power of one shades into the other and sometimes there is difficulty in distinguishing the rights of each.

The legislatures of 48 States are passing diversified laws, seldom are any two of them alike and uniformity is scarcely ever obtained. Those matters that are national in character, affecting all the people alike, should be controlled by a national power, while those matters that are local in character should be controlled by local or State power.

Nearly all of the States have railway boards created for the purpose of regulating rates of the transportation companies. The laws governing these boards are not uniform, yet they seek to reach the same result. The national board is seeking to reach the same result in interstate-commerce rates. Why should they not cooperate with a common purpose and reach effectively the same result?

In order to fix just and reasonable rates the tribunal assuming such functions must have knowledge of the value of railway properties. The different State boards have adopted a variety of methods in arriving at the valuation. Scarcely any two of them agree as to the elements that should be considered in reaching the valuation. Shall capitalization, earning power, commercial value, market value, book value, cost of reproduction, or fair value constitute the basis of the valuation? What will constitute fair deductions also causes a vast amount of uncertainty. What shall be allowed or deducted for engineering fees, contingencies, legal expenses, discount on stock and bonds, promoting, financing, supervision, depreciation, and working capital, all of which constitute uncertainties entering into the valuation of the properties.

About 20 of the States are now engaged in efforts to secure the physical valuation of railroad properties in their respective States. It is estimated that it will cost from $3 to $15 per mile to secure the valuation for rate making and taxation purposes. The National Government, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, is now commencing the herculean task of making a valuation of all the property of railroads engaged in interstate commerce. This appropriation bill carries $1,000,000 for valuation of railroads engaged in interstate commerce. The States will spend millions of dollars in their efforts to fix the valuation for taxation and rate-making purposes and the National Government will duplicate the work and the expense.

After the valuations are made the National and the State Governments will be constantly duplicating the annual expenditures in keeping the evidence up to date. While these large expenditures of the public money are justified in order that just rates may be secured, yet more effective results could be obtained through the spirit of cooperation. Cooperation between the State and national boards would stop the duplication of the work and save vast sums of money. With cooperation it will be largely immaterial whether it be a national duty or a State duty so long as it accomplishes results.

This bill provides the means of bringing about joint action and conferences, and then for a separate ratification by each board. The State boards would have a superior knowledge of local conditions, and would bring a wealth of knowledge to the Federal board, while the Federal board, with its large experience in rate-making methods, would bring into the conference its enriched knowledge of national matters. With a spirit of cooperation these boards would consider the rate-making power from every angle, efficiency guiding their action. The interchange of views would bring capability and would establish high grade and efficient service. The railroads and the shippers would rely implicitly upon fair dealing and fair methods in the rate-making power.

The Federal board would need only to send a single representative to the conference. All policies would be discussed and harmonized, and the boards would engage in a common work, with a common purpose, each looking to the other for friendly assistance and advice. Through the conference all conflict between the Federal and State power could be avoided and each remain supreme in its sphere. We would utilize the State boards by shifting upon them the burden of gathering facts and evidence to aid in the common purpose.

The joint orders and decrees would be stronger because resting upon and fortified by the Federal and State powers. They would be made stronger by concerted action, and at the same time would protect the rights of the State and Nation. One of the important features of the bill is that the joint action of the boards shall not have effect until it is ratified by each separately. When the subject matter of the joint action comes up for ratification, the interested parties are granted a full hearing before the Federal and the State boards, each acting independently of the other.

The State boards would have the judgment of the Federal board, as well as the judgment of the boards of other States, when the matters came up for independent ratification. Likewise the Federal board would have the judgment of the State boards before making its findings effective. This unity of action would in a measure create an alliance against any litigation that might follow.

No constitutional argument could be urged against the proceedings, because the interested parties would have notice of the joint conference. The separate action of each board on the ratification proceedings would also be upon notice, which would constitute due process of law within the meaning of the Constitution. In the first instance the joint action would be simply advisory and would become effective only upon ratification and notice to interested parties.

A dozen State boards could meet together with a single member of the Interstate Commerce Commission in conference. The rates fixed by one board, under the existing practice, affects all railroads; the rates of one State affect all States, and, in turn, affect the fixing of rates in interstate commerce. If one State lowers rates or raises rates, it affects all States, and thus unfair and unjust discrimination arises. This would not be possible if there was uniformity existing in the action of the States. There will always be a conflict between rates made by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the rates fixed by the various States. Some States have lower rates than the interstate rate and some have higher rates. In both instances the system has been unjust. No attempt has been made to equalize these rates. The conferences provided for in the bill would enable the State boards and the Interstate Commerce Commission to work together, so that the State rates and the interstate rates could be made to harmonize.

Section 10 of Article I of the Constitution provides:

> No State shall, without the consent of the Congress * * * enter into any agreement or compact with another State.

Under this provision the States can enter into an agreement in the fixing of transportation rates provided Congress would consent. This bill would bring into play this constitutional provision: Congress by passing the act would approve of the methods and allow the States to agree among themselves, and when they so agreed the congressional consent would exist by reason of the provisions contained in the bill.

By these joint conferences the States could bring about agreements and thus establish uniformity. This provision of the Constitution has been unused and could now be vitalized so as to bring about State cooperation, and, at the same time, with one-half of the expense establish uniformity. If a number of the States could obtain unity of action under the above constitutional provision with the assistance of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the power of regulating rates would be firmly established for all time. The conflict now going on between the public and the carriers would cease and just and fair dealing would constitute the rule of action.

I ask leave to insert, as a part of my remarks, an article on this subject by Hon. Charles E. De Land, of Pierre, S. Dak., published in the Central Law Journal May 2, 1913. [Applause.]

The article by Hon. Charles E. De Land is as follows:

"FEDERAL AND STATE COOPERATION ON RATES.

"Is it feasible for State railway commissions to cooperate with the Interstate Commerce Commission in solving the question of intrastate as related to interstate rates and fares, and vice versa?

"Would such character of joint action and administrative determination pursuant thereto be legally tenable under the Federal system?

"It is believed that both of these questions should be answered in the affirmative.

"The coordinate departments of State governments are as certainly and as devotedly concerned and as lawfully invoked in the process of local or State supervision and control of public carriers as are those of the Federal arm of the Government concerning interstate carriage. This being true, and the subject in hand being peculiarly within the view and potential oversight of the State authorities, it would seem safe to conclude that in an assembly of conference between a given number of State boards and the Interstate Commerce Commission, upon the question of proposed State rate schedules embracing the States thus locally represented, the sum of information, opinion, and judgment expressed by the State boards should be regarded as superior to that of the Federal commission. Among other reasons why this should be true is that in arriving at a conclusion as to the local necessity for, and the mutual fairness as between the public and the carriers of the proposed rates and fares here supposedly under such joint consideration, the local boards must be regarded as having diligently and intelligently considered existing interstate rates and fares as related to existing or proposed inrates, as well as those obtaining locally, and to have compared the former with the latter, and also the relations between and the relative fairness or otherwise of the various schedules in the States so represented as between themselves. For it is matter of common knowledge that the State boards of railway commissioners in current administration do consider these various elements of the questions involved, and, indeed, find it necessary to do so in order to reach intelligent and just conclusions in the premises.

"It would seem to follow from the foregoing, as a further fair deduction, that such a conference between several State boards and the Federal commission could not fail to in some degree enrich the intelligence and strengthen the judgment of the latter board concerning not only the reasonableness or otherwise of the existing interstate rates and fares thus involved but the relations then existing between as well as those which should exist between the inrates and the interstate rates.

"On the other hand, such a conference would as certainly shed some new and valuable light upon the case thus presented, as viewed by the State boards, through special knowledge and resulting superior judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding the existing interstate schedules and their relations to inrates involved imparted by its members to those of the State boards.

"That a mutual desire on the part of the State and Federal commissions to obtain new information and suggestions from the other should exist at all times would seem to be axiomatic. And that the net result of such a conference would be the further maturing of the judgment and efficiency of both the State and Federal boards concerning their respective functions is undeniable. And to the extent that such joint action resulted in tentatively fixing upon the basis of proposed new and mutually satisfactory, reasonable, and fair intrastate rates and fare by such State boards and upon interstate rates by the Federal board a long step would have been taken toward reducing the amount of statutory investigation concerning inrates as related to interstate rates, and vice versa, involved in hearing complaints, as well as toward eliminating court litigation resulting from unsatisfactory action of the boards. And such interchange of views between the Federal and the State boards would bear directly upon and improve the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, wherein it finds itself charged with the incidental duty of affecting and regulating intrastate commerce far enough to protect the freedom of and to regulate interstate commerce. (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 448; Caldwell v. North Carolina, 187 U. S., 623; Gulf, Colorado, etc., Ry. Co. v. Heffey, 158 U. S., 980.)

"Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (96 U. S., 1), while the benefits of such cooperation would increase the capacity of the State boards to act intelligently in so regulating intrastate rates as not to substantially burden or regulate interstate commerce, although it may be thereby remotely or incidentally affected. (Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 136 U. S., 114.)

"If tenable, it is believed that such a process of exchange of views and cooperative action would be or could easily be made practicable; that the necessary time for meetings and deliberation as suggested could be arranged for through administrative regulations, supplemented by some additional legislation, State and Federal. In considering this phase of the subject it can be said that it would not be necessary for the full membership of either the Federal or the State boards to come together in carrying out the processes contemplated in this paper. Representatives of the several bodies, as delegations or committees, could be charged in some authoritative manner with the duty of attending such joint conferences, at stated times and places previously fixed upon by the Federal commission alone or through some arrangement between it and the State boards whose functions were called into action by the particular rate or fares problem in hand. Certain tentative discussion of such problem could be had by the State boards in advance, and if deemed necessary by the Interstate Commerce Commission, in which preliminary deliberations certain conclusions concerning rates or fares could be arrived at as a basis for the proposed joint discussion and action, as the result of which each delegation or committee would be able to bring into joint assembly certain specific propositions for or against a set of existing or proposed schedules, and would urge their respective views in support thereof, subject to such modification or adverse action as the wisdom of the joint deliberation might suggest.

"Again, if the utility of such cooperative action were conceded in advance, or was found, after repeated efforts of this character, to be productive of beneficial results in the general direction above indicated, the practicability of such a plan as a permanent feature of administration in the premises could be expedited, and eventually vindicated, in one of several modes of action. It would probably be found that such joint discussion, exchange of views, and advocacies, and action pursuant thereto, would result in accomplishing ends, in the readjustment of rates and fares, intrastate or interstate, or both, by more practical, inexpensive, expeditious, and effective methods than those now existing. Incidental arrangements could be made by the Interstate Commerce Commission to enable the carriers and complaining shippers, if any, to be heard at the joint meeting; and that incident, as to the State boards, could be effected through similar action by the latter. There would probably result a mutual saving of time which in the end would enable both sets of boards to bestow more time in such joint deliberation and action than was thought possible in the outset. And if such utility and effectiveness were demonstrated in a series of preliminary or experimental joint conferences, the State legislatures and the Congress could readily enlarge the membership of the respective boards, if deemed expedient, for the purpose of enabling them to expend more time in this mode of joint action and in perfecting such a system as a permanent feature of administration, State and Federal.

"If, then, the questions of practicability and utility of such joint discussion and cooperative action were demonstrated by actual experiment to the satisfaction of the Federal and State boards, and the governmental authorities behind them, the further question whether, and if so how far, such joint deliberation and action, if made mandatory and declared effective by statute as regards the Federal and the State governments, would be justified under our Federal system would, of course, arise. The questions involved would seem to be that of empowering the Federal and State boards of railway commissioners, respectively, to enter into such joint deliberation and action, and that of providing that such action should be legally effective through ratification by the respective boards, as regards the subject of fixing and of altering rates and fares, intrastate and interstate, as the result of or the sequel to the joint action under and pursuant to the Federal and the State constitutions.

"And in determining the question of the tenability of such proposed legislation the discussion would go on in the light of what had already been done experimentally by the respective boards. And in discussing what had thus actually occurred it would be seen that all that had been done was effected through the simple process of voluntary action in the delegation of authority by the respective boards to their respective committees or other representatives to meet with and to urge tentative propositions before the joint conference and to report back to their respective bodies the result of such conferences and consequent action, none of the boards, State or Federal, being legally bound by such joint action until confirmed by the respective boards acting normally. In other words, it would appear that the beneficial results attained experimentally, although done informally and outside of the pale of specific statutory authority, had been accomplished without violating any law, State or Federal, since such joint action would not in fact or by intendment be, per se, legally binding upon any of the commissions involved.

"While no actual work seems to have been done thus far by way of cooperation in a joint conference between the State boards and the Interstate Commerce Commission in seeking to tentatively settle upon a set of rates or fares, intrastate or interstate, involved in proceedings pending before either set of boards, yet this subject has been one of repeated and earnest suggestion and recommendation before the conventions of the National Association of Railway Commissioners, in which assemblies members of the Interstate Commerce Commission have annually for many years sat in deliberation with those of a large number of State railway commissions, involving discussions as to ways and means of prompt and effective determination of the questions of rates and fares and many other phases of the work of the respective commissions which regularly come up for debate and recommendation. So clearly has that association put itself on record in this particular that no doubt can arise as to cooperative consideration of rates having been deliberately recommended by members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, including some of its chairmen, before that association. To go no further back than 1908, we find Mr. McChord, chairman of the association, declaring in opening his annual address:

"The necessity for cooperative and concerted action between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State railroad commissions in every phase of the regulation of railroads has been advocated and approved by every convention of this association since it was organized in 1889.

"He there refers to the expressions of Judge Cooley, in whose address at the first session of that organization the latter said, speaking of the relative work of the two sets of railway commissions:

"We are all engaged in a kindred work, and not a kindred work merely, but in a large degree in the same work. What is often spoken of as the railroad system of the United States is an illustration of unity in diversity, such as it would be difficult to find elsewhere in the world.

"Mr. McChord then refers to the remarks of Judge Knapp, then chairman of the Federal commission, made at the preceding convention, where the latter observed that, regarding public interests and independent of legislation—

"We have an opportunity for very useful service * * * by harmonizing as far as we possibly can our policies and our work of administration.

"Mr. McChord then refers to the additional powers granted to the Federal commission by the Hepburn Act, and observes:

"Now that these additional powers have been conferred and as the intrastate regulation of railroads is so closely allied with that of interstate regulation, it is but natural that the State commissions are looking to the Interstate Commerce Commission for closer cooperation in the struggle they are making against such great odds in their efforts to regulate the railroads of their respective States.

"The 'importance of cooperation of State governments and the Federal Government in the regulation of rates' is emphasized, in view of judicial decisions adverted to, and he makes this specific recommendation:

"We believe that a practical and feasible plan of cooperation would be that when complaint has been filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and a copy served upon the defendant carrier, and it is cited to appear and defend, * * * the commissioners of the States affected by that complaint should be furnished with similar copies and notices and be granted leave to intervene or submit argument in support of or against the relief sought by the complainant, and, in a similar way, when complaint has been filed with the State commissions, which would of necessity affect interstate rates, a copy of such complaint should be furnished the Interstate Commerce Commission, and both State and Federal commissions should feel free to call for such information as each may possess bearing upon the subject matter under investigation. In short, if the State and Federal commissions are to cooperate in this work, and if there is to be preserved to the State commissions their present usefulness and the limited powers yet left them, something tangible along these lines should be agreed upon by this association and should be carried out without further delay.

"That 'it is clear that if the Interstate Commerce Commission is to effectually cooperate with the various State commissions it must have some officer or representative whose sole duty it is to keep constantly in touch with these State commissions and keep a record of all that they are doing.' And after observing that—

"Under our dual form of government the State commissions are at last at the mercy of the Federal authorities—

"He adds:

"Therefore I am firmly of the opinion that the Federal and State commissions should get together in the beginning of these investigations, and by mutually cooperating and assisting each other be in better position to maintain in the courts their respective orders when made. (Proceedings of National Association of Railway Commissioners, 1908, pp. 10–14.)

"In 1909, Mr. Decker, president of the National Association of Railway Commissioners, in his address at the annual convention of that association, spoke of the trade elements which—

"Create a lasting interpendence between the States and the Nation in regulation of our commerce. (Proceedings of National Association of Railway Commissioners, 1909, p. 10.)

"In 1910 the same distinguished official said in a similar connection—

"We have about reached the time, I think, when investigation of related railway rates may properly include conferences between regulating commissions before determination.

"That the line of demarkation between State and Federal jurisdiction being, fundamentally, determined, harmonious action is promoted by 'trying through conferences and cooperation to bring about rates and rate rules based upon consideration of right and justice to all concerned.' That 'the association through its committees may work actively toward securing harmonious action,' and 'many things that remain to be accomplished may be constantly progressed under the larger comprehension and broader outlook resulting either from special conferences between particular commissions or as the result of the work of committees acting under the authority of this association.' That 'still greater effective work can be done by the various commissions through associated action. * * * To that end it would be advisable for the various commissions to so arrange their own engagements that their members may participate actively through the year in the general but highly important work as fixed by the association in convention. It is worthy of careful consideration whether conferences between State commissions and the Interstate Commerce Commission concerning the work in which any State commission and the Federal commission may have joint interest would not be valuable.' (Proceedings of National Association of Railway Commissioners, 1910, pp. 10–13.)

"In 1911, Judge Clements, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in his annual address before that association, said:

"It would be useless for me to repeat what all know, and that is that the conferences and sessions of this convention, and the recommendations of the association and the cooperation between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State commissions and between the State commissions themselves, have been of the utmost value to all of us and to all who are engaged in this most important work of railway regulation. (Proceedings of National Association of Railway Commissioners, 1911, p. 5.)

"The foregoing quotations from addresses made before the National Association of Railway Commissioners clearly indicate that the scope of suggested and proposed action between State commissions themselves, and between them and the Interstate Commerce Commission, embraces not merely the deliberations and consequent action of that association, but conferences between the various sets of State boards, and also between such of the latter as may be involved in determining a pending question and the Federal board, wherein the latter may find its functions operative in determining the relations between the inrates and the interrates thus actually or possibly involved; and also the proposition of action by such State boards and the Federal commission, in becoming by intervention or otherwise, parties to pending proceedings before either or any of those bodies, and in being heard in the determination of the question involved, through counsel and also through committees or delegations. Thus, 'cooperative and concerted action,' 'closer cooperation,' 'harmonizing of policies,' freedom in 'calling for information,' 'effectual cooperation' between the Federal and State boards through 'some officer or representative,' 'getting together in the beginnings of these investigations' and 'by mutually cooperating and assisting each other,' to 'create a lasting interdependence between the States and the Nation,' and 'conferences between regulating committees before determination,' under 'the larger comprehension and broader outlook' resulting from 'special conferences between particular commissions' 'through the year'—all these proposed expedients are evidences of serious consideration and urgent recommendation at the hands of the highest deliberative body existing in this country as the representative of the administrative functions of our State and Federal boards in regulating and controlling commerce, State and National.

"Now while some of these various recommendations may not have been intended to mean joint deliberate action on rates, in the sense of expressing formal conclusions into which both

State and Federal administrative action enter in a responsible way, yet the terms actually used do mean just that character of work. Cooperation is the act of 'cooperating, or of operating together to one end; joint operation; concurrent effort or labor.' Conference means 'formal consultation,' 'interchange of views,' or 'a meeting for consultation, discussion, or instruction.' While 'concerted action' is indicated by the verb 'concert,' which means 'to plan together; to settle or adjust by conference, agreement, or consultation.'

"If these defined means to the end are not broad enough to comprehend and to justify the expedients suggested in this paper, it is difficult to understand how they can be interpreted to mean less than that.

"Suppose then that Congress, and the legislatures of the various States, or some of them, shall enact legislation providing for such conferences as may be deemed necessary or expedient between the State boards and the Interstate Commerce Commission, concerning pending rate questions existing either independently of, or under, complaint, and embracing provisions for presenting evidence bearing upon the questions at issue, by or before the respective boards; that the findings and conclusions arrived at in such conferences regarding questions not then in litigation shall, when ratified by each board acting by itself, be legally binding upon the respective participating boards, and further declaring binding upon each State board and the Federal commission conference findings and conclusions in litigated cases where carriers are parties or are represented—that is, binding, upon such ratification, upon carriers, complainants, and State boards wherein the joint action related to intrastate traffic, and upon the same parties and the Interstate Commerce Commission when related to interstate traffic. That such Federal legislation was designed to operate as a complement to similar legislation by the respective States, and vice versa concerning legislation by the latter. That through such dual system of legislation cases or pending questions, involving the fixing or changing of both inrates and interrates were consolidated in the sense that questions pertaining to intrastate traffic, in one or more States, the determination of which questions would or might affect interstate traffic and rates, could be tentatively determined by the Federal commission acting in conference with the State boards; and containing a complementary provision enabling the Federal commission and other State boards to participate in like manner in the tentative determination of similar issues pending before a particular State board, with like binding force upon the Federal commission as to interstate rates after ratification by it; such joint conclusions not to be regarded as in law constituting an administrative decision, or the equivalent of due process of law in the quasi legal sense or otherwise. That carriers and shippers, in order to be bound by such a proceeding, could participate therein by becoming parties under issues presenting specific questions, with the right to submit evidence and be heard argumentatively, both as to State and interstate traffic issues if and when presented, and with the further right to be heard in the separate State or Federal commerce tribunal when the question of ratification or rejection of the joint conclusions was presented in such separate body; with or without further provision requiring carriers under certain specified circumstances, to become parties to such proceeding. Would such a system of procedure be tenable? And if not, why not?

"Each State element in such conference would present issues involving the case in hand as related to intrastate rates and fares in the particular State or States. The findings and conclusions would therefore meet those issues as fully as if the particular State board or boards had acted alone in considering them. The same would be true of the Federal commission regarding issues as to interstate schedules. The tentative findings and conclusions would therefore as fully cover all issues of both characters as would be the case if separate initial determinate action had been resorted to. There would, in consequence, be found a record of the joint conference in question, presenting a juridical repository from which the State and Federal boards, respectively, and the carriers and complainants as parties, could draw in making up for presentation before any separate board at its ratification session such partial record embracing issues pertaining to the functions of such separate board as might be necessary for such purpose.

"The mere fact that in such conference a board created by and accountable solely to the Federal power, and limited in its administrative acts and determinations to functions concerning interstate commerce, had actually participated in drawing conclusions concerning intrastate commerce, would not in law vitiate those conclusions. This is obvious, since all that would have been done by the Federal commission would be merely advisory, and the State board or boards would merely have had the benefit of the views and judgment of the Federal commission in support of such conclusions. The conclusions themselves might or might not have been actually assented to although nominally acquiesced in by such board or boards. Equally sound upon similar reasoning would seem to be the contention that mere participation by State boards in such conference conclusions, wherein they referred solely to interstate rates, would not vitiate such conclusions. And this contention as applied to either case is strengthened when we reflect that in lending such mutual aid, each and all representatives or committees of boards in question would, in thus cooperating, be simply using their faculties of judgment precisely as they would if acting normally; since every question of State rates would or might involve, incidentally, its relations to interstate rates, and vice versa.

"If it be objected to the plan of joint procedure above outlined, that it presents a medley of State and Federal elements of administrative deliberation and adjudication, involving confusion as to the identity of the tribunal in which the conference deliberation and hearing was had, and before which the parties, carriers and otherwise, would thus appear, or as to the issues as related to those elements, it would seem that by adopting rules and regulations pursuant to appropriate State and Federal legislation, this phase of the subject could easily be met, to the end of preserving the rights of complainants and other litigants on the record, concerning their attitudes, objections, and exceptions as related to both State and Federal elements of action so involved, as well as before the future respective ratification sessions.

"Some practical difficulty might be encountered by the boards of those States other than that in which the particular joint conference met, in the production of evidence beyond the State limits, for use before the conference, and in enforcing the appearance of witnesses. However, to the extent that such difficulty might be anticipated in a given case, the taking of testimony and incidental evidence within the particular State might go on before an examiner, or some State official, the depositions so taken to be used both before the joint and the subsequent hearings. Again, the question of evidence might, under a somewhat different procedure, be solved by some means whereby the conference conclusions could be made to rest upon some information and evidence calculated to raise a presumption of their reasonableness and fairness, the issue to be finally contested at the respective ratification sessions; with the right to produce further evidence both by way of attack and in support of the action of the conference.

"There seems to be no sufficient ground for the conclusion that such a conference procedure would be violative of the Federal Constitution. If it would, the conclusion would seem to be warranted because due Federal procedure had thus been defeated, or Federal jurisdiction in the Interstate Commerce Commission had been injuriously invaded by concerted action between it and a State board or boards, through encroachment by State authority upon the field of Federal power. And such a result of cooperative action would also affect the right of a carrier, as a party to a proceeding before the Federal commission, to appear and be heard before that body as a distinct, independent tribunal capable legally of making and enforcing a valid order, involving directly and vitally interstate commerce.

"But unless due process under Federal jurisdiction had been defeated or unduly obstructed by such joint action, the Federal Constitution would not have been invaded by such participation of a State board or boards.

"But jurisdiction, in order to be subject to such invasion, must be in course of exercise to the end of a determination of an issue or right in the particular proceeding and forum. (Brown on Jurisdiction, sec. 1. United States v. Arredondo, 6 Pet., 709; Pittsburg, etc., R. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S., 421; 10 Am. and Eng. Encyc. of Law, pp. 290, 300.)

"However, no such determinate function has been imputed to such a joint deliberation in conference as we have hereinbefore supposed to be in existence. On the contrary, we have assumed that the proposed legislation would go no further than to render the conference act merely tentative or advisory, postponing final or determinative action to the future and separate proceedings of the respective boards constituting the constituent elements of the conference. And such being the character of the deliberations of the joint conference, the cooperation of the State boards could not have the effect of destroying or substantially invading Federal jurisdiction or power operating in determinate action.

"The principle we have assumed to be applicable to a proceeding pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, when a State board is supposed to be acting in conjunction with the former, would seem to apply with equal force to the conference action if the relations between the two sets of boards were reversed and the Federal commission were participating in a proceeding pending before a State board of railway commissioners. In either case, the fact that issues primarily determinable solely by the board to whose membership the other board had acceded for purposes of the conference, were considered by such acceding element, would not amount to an invasion of Federal or of State power or jurisdiction, as the case might be.

"If such a system of treatment of questions of rates and fares as is outlined in this paper were in force, it would seem that its utility in advancing the cause of prompt, simple, and effectual settlement of problems involving groups of schedules and territory would be proven beyond dispute. If, for instance, such a complexity of questions or relations and prospective disturbances between the in-rates and inter-rates and fares as that of the Minnesota Rate cases (Shepard v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., et al., 184 Fed. Rep., 765), could have been dealt with through conferences of the general character hereinbefore indicated, followed by final administrative action by the State boards in fixing and in changing in-rates and fares, and by the Federal commission in readjusting those of interstate character as related to the State schedules involved, after hearing upon evidence, the various carriers interested being parties, is it to be doubted that such joint action and subsequent determination would have resulted in a readjusted system of schedules which, although not in all respects such as would have entirely eliminated litigation thereafter concerning such settlements and schedules, would yet have been mutually satisfactory to the railway commissions and the railroads in all or nearly all main aspects of the general problem? The State boards of, say, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, and Wisconsin might have thus met at St. Paul with a delegation of the Interstate Commerce Commission after the respective phases of the proposed action of the Minnesota board, as they would appear to the other boards, State and Federal, had been considered in advance and a set of suggestions and contentions had been framed by them, respectively, for such joint consideration; the various carriers affected could have appeared at the conference and been heard in the light of more or less evidence adduced by them and by the boards; a tentative set of schedules could have been framed by the conference, each set being thereafter taken up by its appropriate board and confirmed in whole or in part, with such modifications in detail, if any, as might have been deemed proper, the carriers and boards bringing into these separate final hearings such contentions and further evidence as the laws and rules of practice would permit.

"Such a system of procedure would also be almost certain to result in more or less periodical conferences looking to successive readjustments of rates and fares, upon some general plan or plans of consideration wrought out as a further consequence of the establishment of the initial practice itself. In this way large areas of territory, embracing a multitude of related rate problems, would in time come to be treated under some well-defined system of administrative management and subjection to hearings for the joint benefit of the carriers and the public.

"The time has, indeed, come for serious general consideration by the public of any and all possible expedients under the administration of the State and Federal railway commissions, through which to simplify, expedite, and effectuate modes of adjustment of rates and fares under the rapidly changing circumstances and conditions surrounding State and interstate commerce. If some plan of joint action to that end similar to or widely differing from the one outlined in this paper can, after due discussion and investigation, be established, the sooner such a desirable end is accomplished the better it will be for the general welfare."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT].

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to make a few remarks upon two questions that have been discussed quite freely of late. Some of the States, especially in the Northeast, where there has been a tremendous influx of immigrants who in a short time become insane, are agitating the proposition that the Federal Government ought to bear a part of the expense of the maintenance of such alien insane and who become insane. I desire to oppose that idea, because I feel that it is a condition that can be corrected to a very great extent by the restrictive measures embraced in the bill which passed the House at this session. This bill, when passed, will keep out thousands of these very people who become insane in a short while after they reach our shores. As long as gentlemen in Congress from those States whose asylums are being filled with alien insane oppose a restriction which will prevent the coming of such people, I shall oppose the people of my State and other sections of the country being forced to bear any part of the expense of maintaining that class of people.

The other proposition, Mr. Chairman, is that there are many associations and some people who are advocating the policy that the Government at its expense should furnish means for the distribution of immigrants throughout the country. It would be manifestly unjust to require the Government to pay the expenses, or any part of the expenses, of these people to force them upon others who do not want them. Yet such would be the result of that kind of legislation. The Progressive Party in one of the planks of its platform, as I recollect it, announced that it believed in a distribution, perhaps, of that kind. I believe it would be unfair to people who favor keeping out that class of immigrants to say that they should be made to bear any part of the burden of carrying those people into their communities. The very communities into which the advocates of distribution by Government want to send them are the ones in which they are not wanted. And then the greatest trouble, Mr. Chairman, is that when they are distributed they will not stay distributed unless it suits them to do so. There was an example of that kind in South Carolina a few years ago, when, through the activity of some of its industries, that State brought a shipload of aliens over to work in the cotton mills of the State, and in perhaps less than 30 days from the time they landed and went to the mills they left them, went into the congested districts of the North, where their own people were. It is simply absurd to talk about the Government going into the business of distributing people into sections where they are not wanted and where they do not want to go. That kind of an agitation is being gotten up for the purpose, as I think, of trying to sidetrack and postpone the passage of legislation that will keep out that very kind of people. Take the people from the great Northwest. They do not need any inducement by the Government or by anyone else to carry them into sections where they thrive and where they build up the material prosperity of the sections to which they go.

The great Scandinavian people, who have built up to a marked degree the Northwest, did not think, when they came in in large numbers, of asking for Government aid to send them into the interior. The Germans and the Irish came, and many others of the desirable people from northwest Europe, and when they were scattering themselves over the country and aiding in its upbuilding and in the development of the country they were not aided. The man in my State that desires to make his home in Texas or in New Mexico or anywhere else is not asking to be helped, and yet it is proposed to help those who are coming here for the purpose, many of them, of bettering their financial condition and returning to the country whence they came. And those who are agitating the bringing of that class of people are the ones who are also agitating the distribution of them at the Government expense. I have always been liberal, Mr. Chairman, whenever the question of establishing stations for the protection of these people when they arrive in this country has been discussed. I have always been in favor of liberal appropriations.

I was sorry a few days ago, when some gentlemen who take the contrary view as to restriction were opposing the construction of an immigration station at Baltimore which would have been adequate for the care of the arriving aliens. When they come, and come voluntarily, I want our country to present to them the best conditions that we have. I do not believe in stimulating immigration. We all deprecate, as we claim, stimulated immigration; and yet that very idea is involved in the question of distribution. It is stimulating the distribution of these people to sections of the country that they themselves are not seeking; and I, for one, desire now to say that whenever an effort is made either to compel the General Government to pay any part of the maintenance of the insane from other countries or to pay any part of the expense of distributing them into other sections of the country, I shall raise my voice and cast my vote against it every time.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman stated a moment ago something about his view of the Progressive position with reference to the distribution of immigrants. One fact is that here a short time ago every Progressive on the floor, with the possible exception of one or two, voted for the literacy test in the gentleman's bill. Now does the gentleman assert that that bill is being held up—that is the rumor, at any rate—by President Wilson, and that the President is against it? Does the gentleman know whether that is true or not?

Mr. BURNETT. I do not; and I do not believe the President has ever said to anyone that he was opposed to that bill. I do not know why it is being sidetracked in the Senate, if it is being sidetracked; but I do not believe that President Wilson, after the declarations he made a few years ago in a book which he wrote in criticizing the very class of people that would be kept out by the literacy test, will veto that bill or has said to anybody that he would do so.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman must admit that the Progressives helped him in the enactment of that bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Yes; every one except one of them, I think.

In regard to the first proposition, that of Government aid in the care of alien insane, I will say that a few weeks ago I received a letter from the governor of New York urging the passage of a law by Congress requiring the Federal Government to aid in their care and maintenance. I wrote him that the Burnett illiteracy-test bill if enacted into law would keep out thousands of this class of people, and yet the Members of Congress from New York City were loud in their opposition to this bill. This opposition showed their willingness to receive them, and yet when they get here they want the people of Alabama and other States to help support the insane who come in.

If they so readily open their gates to receive them, in the name of justice should they not be willing to support them?

I also received a resolution passed a short time ago by the New Hampshire Medical Society on May 13, 1914, asking "assumption by the Federal Government of an equitable share of the burden of caring for dependent aliens which is now borne by the States." An equitable share, indeed! Would it be equitable for States who are clamoring for the exclusion of these very people to be compelled to bear any part of the burden of the care and support of the paupers and lunatics forced into our country by the folly of Members of Congress? The annual expense of caring for the alien insane in New York alone is nearly $3,000,000. This number is being each year greatly increased by the admission of that very low class of immigrants that the illiteracy test would keep out.

In the report of the New York Board of Alienists for the year ending September 30, 1911, on page 22, the following statement is made:

> For the first few years after the commencement of that remarkable migration of the races of southern and eastern Europe to this country (to which Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Russia have contributed nearly 500,000 persons a year) it is noted that the increase of patients of those nationalities in the State hospitals was gradual. By 1905, however, it was possible to predict that when the effects of the "new immigration" commenced to be felt the "old immigration" (of Germans, Irish, and Scandinavians) would be outdone in the numbers of insane added to the foreign-born population of our State hospitals. To-day that prediction is fulfilled, and during the year more than 55 per cent of the aliens deported by the United States Immigration Service were natives of those three countries.

The New York Times of March 28, 1912, says:

> INSANE ALIENS.
> The Times is informed by Secretary McGarr, of the State commission in lunacy, that of the 31,432 insane patients under treatment in the 14 State hospitals on February 10 last, 13,163, or 41.9 per cent, were aliens. Foreign-born patients have increased since the Federal census of December 31, 1903, by 1,552, or 13.4 per cent. In the two State hospitals for the criminal insane there were 1,230 patients on February 10, of whom nearly 44.4 per cent were of alien birth; the Federal census of 1910 showed a percentage of aliens to total population in this State of 29.9 per cent.
> The prevalence of insanity among immigrants is evidently much greater than among the native born. Of the 5,700 patients admitted to the civil hospitals for the year ending September 30, 1911, 2,737, or 48 per cent, were aliens, and 1,481, or 26 per cent, were of alien parentage, while only 1,224, less than 26 per cent, were of native stock. Of the whole number, the nativity of but 218, which is 3.8 per cent, was not ascertainable. Insanity among the foreign peoples of this city occurs in a still larger percentage of cases. Of the first admissions to the hospitals, 2,003 out of 3,221 residents of the city were of foreign birth; that is 64.1 per cent, although the foreign-born population is but 40.4 per cent of the whole.

Do other States want the same conditions to arise in their borders? Does Indiana want its insane asylums and poorhouses filled with low Italians and Greeks? If not, they should see to it that their Members vote right on the bill which, to a great extent, will prevent that condition. If the Government is made to pay the expense of distributing the aliens as they come in, the day will soon come when the poorer States will see their asylums, almshouses, and penitentiaries filled with the most undesirable lot that can be inflicted on any people. Last year over 1,300,000 aliens came to this country. The year before about the same. Within the last 10 years nearly 12,000,000 came in. The numbers are increasing every year. Suppose this continues for 10 years longer.

Suppose in the meantime the plan of Government distribution should be adopted. Then the Black Hand and the Mafia and Camorra will not be confined to New York and Chicago, but the lives of honest people in every State in the Union will be at the mercy of these assassins.

True, the Black Hand leaders would escape the illiteracy test, but it would keep out thousands of illiterates who are easy tools and dupes in the hands of the leaders. Besides, other sections of the bill, if passed, would keep out the leaders themselves.

This idea of distribution is a delusion and a snare, and is intended to forestall legislation that would keep out the undesirable hordes that are flocking to our shores.

All plans for the distribution of immigrants have proved a failure wherever tried. Immigration distributes itself. As has often been pointed out, schemes to distribute immigrants have invariably been advocated by the steamship or transportation companies, or by persons who believe that we ought to have an unlimited supply of cheap labor, regardless of the maintenance of a high standard of living for American workmen.

The present Division of Information in the Bureau of Immigration I regard as a useless appendage, barren of beneficial results. The Immigration Commission, of which I was a member, investigated this question carefully, and reached the following conclusion:

> The law of 1907 provided for the establishment of a division of information in the Bureau of Immigration, the intent being that the division should disseminate among admitted immigrants information relative to opportunities for settlers in sections of the country apart from cities and purely industrial centers. It was hoped that the division could devise means of inaugurating a movement among immigrants which would eventually result in their more equitable distribution. The apparent result, however, does not indicate that the purpose of the law is being fulfilled. As conducted, the work of the division appears to be essentially that of an employment agency whose chief function is supplying individuals to meet individual demands for labor in agricultural districts. It does not appear that persons thus distributed have, as a rule, been distributed with the purpose that they would become permanent settlers in the districts to which they went, but rather that a more or less temporary need of the employer and employee was supplied through this agency.
> No satisfactory or permanent distribution of immigrants can be effected through any Federal employment system, no matter how widespread, because the individual will seek such social and economic conditions as best suit him, no matter where sent.

The distribution that is being made by soulless employers of labor is working grievous wrong and hardship to the old immigrant and the American workingman. Look up the history of the recent reign of terror in the Colorado and Michigan strikes and you will find that they were brought about by the employment of the low-priced alien who drove out the old immigrant and the Americans who wanted a living wage to support and clothe those whom God had made dependent on them.

When will the country arouse from its lethargy and drive from Congress those who vote to weld the shackles on the hands of labor?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN].

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting some remarks and a speech recently made on industrial conditions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the remarks and speech indicated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, no one could hear what the matter indicated was.

The CHAIRMAN. Some remarks and a speech made on the subject of industrial conditions.

Mr. MANN. Whose speech?

Mr. CARLIN. A speech of Secretary Redfield's, recently made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] is recognized for 15 minutes.

[Mr. BURKE of South Dakota addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-nine Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FITZGERALD) there were 26 ayes and 42 noes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. GILLETT.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 15 ayes and 85 noes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Has a member of the committee, when he knows the count is wrong, the right to make a protest? When he knows that certain Members have voted twice is there any relief or remedy from a practice of that kind, a practice of Members that have probably been schooled in Tammany Hall?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The count of the tellers is absolutely correct. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the chairman have not been counted. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum, and then goes out so that he can not be counted.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I am asking for information from the Chair, if the House of Congress is going to adopt the practices of Tammany Hall?

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman from Illinois has no right to make any such an untrue statement on the floor of Congress, and I enter my protest against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no method of determining except from the report of the tellers.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. And there is no way to verify the count?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; there is a way to verify the count; just let the gentleman from Illinois stay here instead of running out to avoid being counted and trying to reduce the number. He might be satisfied with his own count, although I doubt that.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The gentleman from New York is mistaken; the gentleman from Illinois did not run out; and the gentleman from New York, as he did yesterday, is trying to defeat one of the most meritorious bills that has ever been before Congress, and these reactionaries from New York are following him and trying to kill legislation for the benefit of the laboring people of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. Answering the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will state that the Chair is dependent on the tellers for the report. The tellers report that there were 15 ayes and 85 noes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be allowed to state that I counted not only the ayes but also the noes, and the count was absolutely correct. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. And I want to repeat my statement, Mr. Chairman, that the count was incorrect; I can count as well as the tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois will be in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, the count was 15 ayes and 85 noes, and I just came from the Senate Chamber, and I asked a page to notify Members of the House in there, and they came in after the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is settled; the report of the tellers is final.

Mr. FOWLER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOWLER. Was the count on a quorum or on the question as to whether the committee would rise or not?

The CHAIRMAN. On the question as to whether the committee would rise.

Mr. FOWLER. The Chair has not so reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that the noes had it. The committee determines not to rise, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the objects hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, namely.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, from time to time the Treasury Department is sending estimates here for additional sums for public buildings where arrangements have been completed to acquire sites which are authorized. I ask unanimous consent that the public-buildings items included in the first 19 pages of the bill be passed over until the end of the bill, so that as official estimates come in an opportunity may be had to investigate them and offer such amendments as may be proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the public-buildings items appearing from page 2 to line 21 on page 19, inclusive, be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNDER THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, CONSTRUCTION AND SITES.

For sites, commencement, continuation, or completion of public buildings within the respective limits of cost authorized by law, including rent and removal expenses in cities pending extension and remodeling of buildings, as follows.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the items in the bill from page 2 down to and including line 21, page 19, be postponed for consideration until after section 14 has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves that the public-buildings items, from page 2 down to and including line 21, page 19, be postponed until after section 14 is read.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUARANTINE STATIONS.

The provision in the sundry civil act approved June 23, 1913, which reads as follows: "Cape Charles Quarantine Station: Residence for quarantine officer, $8,000," is amended so as to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to cause such residence to be erected upon land now owned by the United States at Fort Monroe, Va.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman what the object is in moving the residence of the officer in charge of the quarantine station at Cape Charles from a place where it would be convenient to put it over to where the Government now owns land, I suppose where Fort Monroe is, where he would have to be conveyed back and forth every day probably by Government vessels?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, under the original authorization it was intended to put this residence at Fort Monroe. When an attempt was made to erect a station, as intended and as was explained when the appropriation was originally made, it was ascertained that there was some doubt whether the expenditures for the residence at that particular place should be approved. This item was to carry out what was intended should be done when the appropriation was made in the last sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. Where is this quarantine station located?

Mr. FITZGERALD. On Fishermans Island.

Mr. MANN. How far is that from the point?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not very far. It is out in the bay.

Mr. MANN. It is quite a ride from Fort Monroe to this place. My recollection is that it takes several hours to make it, and of course it requires the services of a cutter or a quarantine boat, and it will take that much longer than it would if the officer lived within a reasonable distance from the quarantine station. What is the object in locating the residence of the quarantine officer a good many miles away from where he has to perform his duties?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The intention was to have the quarantine officer commence boarding at sunrise, and the boat leaves Fort Monroe to meet the incoming vessels.

Mr. MANN. Does that boat run into Norfolk every night? Of course, that is where the boat goes, if it goes in. Why should the quarantine boat go into Norfolk every night instead of tying up at the quarantine station?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not into Norfolk. It is into Chesapeake Bay.

Mr. MANN. When Government vessels go into Fort Monroe, they tie up at Norfolk, as a rule. There is no place for them to tie up at Fort Monroe that I know of.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Vessels going up the Potomac are boarded at this point.

Mr. MANN. I imagine the quarantine officers do not wait to board a vessel going up the Potomac River until it gets into the Potomac River. They board the vessel out at sea.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statement is that the vessel on which he boards leaves Fort Monroe, and the desire is to have the officer reside there so that he could start out at sunrise.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it is natural for the officer to prefer to reside at a military camp where there are a lot of military officers, and have a nice home there, although it is not convenient to his place of business, and then have the Government vessel spend some hours every day taking him to and fro so as to get him to his place of business from where he lives at night. It does not strike me as very economical, nor do I think we ought to run the whole business of the Government based on the fancy of an officer that he wants to live where the other officers live.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The quarantine officer resides at present, it was stated last year to the committee, in an old hulk which is anchored off Fort Monroe. On several occasions the vessel broke away and drifted out with the doctor's outfit, and a rescuing party had to be sent after it. The statement was made that it was desired to have a physician at Fort Monroe. Fishermans Island is 19 miles across the bay, but the physician has been residing not on Fishermans Island but in this old hulk.

Mr. MANN. Is not Fishermans Island where the physician ought to reside?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. If they have a quarantine station there, why should not the officer in charge of it live at that quarantine station instead of our having to convey him every day by vessel 19 miles at considerable expense necessarily?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They say it is necessary to have a physician on shore in the daytime where he can receive messages and be in touch with his work. When the station was authorized a residence was authorized and the intention was to place it at Fortress Monroe. Under the provision as worded it could not be built there, and this is to permit them to put the physician on shore at Fortress Monroe. It may be just as well to leave him in the old hulk or to put him at Fishermans Island, but the Public Health Service seemed to believe it was desirable and essential that this residence should be at this particular point.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to set my judgment up against the judgment of the committee, although I can not see that they have very good judgment in regard to the matter, and I shall withdraw the pro forma amendment. I can understand how an officer in the service likes to live near the Hotel Chamberlin at Old Point Comfort. It makes it very pleasant in the evening for social engagements and things of that sort, but it is a long way from where he is performing his duty. He wants to build a residence there, and I take it that is where it will be built—over where the residences of the officers of the Army are, convenient to the crowds that gather at the Chamberlin Hotel during the season.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think that might make it more congenial.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it makes it more congenial, but I am afraid not more effective.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Surgeon General of the Public Health Service insisted it was highly desirable to have the residence at Fort Monroe, that all of the quarantine work for Norfolk, Newport News, Hampton, Smithfield, and Richmond should be done from that station.

As to whether a message can be received from the one at Fishermans Island I am unable to say. This seems to be the opinion of those in control of the service, and it is the intention to build a residence at this place and this enables it to be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, REPAIRS, EQUIPMENT, AND GENERAL EXPENSES.

Repairs and preservation: For repairs and preservation of all completed and occupied public buildings and the grounds thereof, under the control of the Treasury Department, and for wire partitions and fly screens therefor, Government wharves and piers under the control of the Treasury Department, together with the necessary dredging adjacent thereto, buildings and wharf at Sitka, Alaska, and the Secretary of the Treasury may, in renting said wharf, require that the lessee shall make all necessary repairs thereto; for care of vacant sites under the control of the Treasury Department, such as necessary fences, filling dangerous holes, cutting grass and weeds, but not for any permanent improvements thereon; for repairs and preservation of buildings not reserved by vendors on sites under the control of the Treasury Department acquired for public buildings or the enlargement of public buildings, the expenditures on this account for the current fiscal year not to exceed 15 per cent of the annual rentals of such buildings: Provided, That of the sum herein appropriated not exceeding $100,000 may be used for marine hospitals and quarantine stations, including wire partitions and fly screens for same, and not exceeding $14,000 for the Treasury, Butler, and Winder Buildings at Washington, D. C., including the old building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing: Provided further, That this sum shall not be available for the payment of personal services except for work done by contract or for temporary job labor under exigency not exceeding at one time the sum of $100 at any one building, $725,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph for the purpose of asking the gentleman from New York what is meant by the words "building and wharf at Sitka, Alaska, and the Secretary of the Treasury may, in renting said wharf, require that the lessee shall make all necessary repairs thereto." What is the purpose of this? Is the Government going to embark in the building of a wharf for the purpose of leasing it to somebody else?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a little old frame building with a wharf. The department wanted to sell it for some nominal sum. This provision is placed in this item so as to prevent the Treasury Department from engaging in extensive repairs to the wharf at Sitka, Alaska. The provision for the lease has been such that the lessee is required to make all the repairs and permit the Government boat to dock at this wharf. The department prefers to have this changed and permit them to turn it over to the city of Sitka, if I recall correctly, but the committee did not think it wise to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. The Government owns this wharf now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provision has been carried in this item for some years, and is to prevent the use of this appropriation for a very large expenditure.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses: To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to execute and give effect to the provisions of section 6 of the act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stats., p. 537, pt. 1): For additional salary of $1,000 for the Supervising Architect of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1915; for one architectural designer, at $6,000 per annum; for foremen draftsmen, architectural draftsman, and apprentice draftsmen, at rates of pay from $480 to $2,500 per annum; for structural engineers and draftsmen, at rates of pay from $840 to $2,200 per annum; for mechanical, sanitary, electrical, heating and ventilating, and illuminating engineers and draftsmen, at rates of pay from $1,200 to $2,400 per annum; for computers and estimators, at rates of pay from $1,600 to $2,500 per annum, the expenditures under all the foregoing classes for which a minimum and maximum rate of compensation is stated, not to exceed $168,450; for supervising superintendents, superintendents, and junior superintendents of construction and inspectors, at rates of pay from $1,600 to $2,900 per annum, not to exceed $278,960; for expenses of superintendence, including expenses of all inspectors and other officers and employees, on duty or detailed in connection with work on public buildings and the furnishing and equipment thereof, under orders from the Treasury Department; office rent and expenses of superintendents, including temporary stenographic and other assistance in the preparation of reports and the care of public property, etc.; advertising; office supplies, including drafting materials, specially prepared paper, typewriting machines, adding machines, and other mechanical labor-saving devices, and exchange of same; furniture, carpets, electric-light fixtures and office equipment; telephone service; not to exceed $6,000 for stationery; not to exceed $1,000 for books of reference, law books, technical periodicals and journals, subscriptions to which may be paid in advance; for contingencies of every kind and description, traveling expenses of site agents, recording deeds and other evidences of title, photographic instruments, chemicals, plates, and photographic materials, and such other articles and supplies and such minor and incidental expenses not enumerated, connected solely with work on public buildings, the acquisition of sites, and the administrative work connected with the annual appropriations under the Supervising Architect's Office as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order or approve, but not including heat, light, janitor service, awnings, curtains, or any expenses for the general maintenance of the Treasury Building, or surveys, plaster models, progress photographs, test pit borings, or mill and shop inspections, $563,560.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the paragraph. On page 23 I discover that there is a provision for the increase of the architect's salary for the coming year of $1,000. What is the necessity for that increase?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been carried in this way for a great many years. The salary of $5,000 is carried in the legislative bill. For a number of years since the work of the Supervising Architect's Office has been very greatly increased an additional $1,000 has been carried in this item.

Mr. FOWLER. I discover also that the gentleman provides for a salary of $6,000 for an architectural designer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That place is authorized by law. It is authorized in the last public-buildings act.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it authorized at the salary of $6,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; in the public-buildings act approved March 4, 1913. I can refer the gentleman to it, if he desires—section 28, "that the employment is hereby authorized of an architectural designer at a compensation of $6,000 per annum."

Mr. FOWLER. Well, the matter which occurs to me, in reference to the compensation, is that these men, whom I regard as holding subordinate positions, get a greater salary than the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Assistant Postmasters General of the Post Office Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. The technical services rendered by these men are of such a character that this designer was provided in order to avoid, if possible, or as much as possible, the employment of certain outside architects at very large fees. After the repeal of the Tarsney Act, by which the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized, in his discretion, to employ outside architects for any public building, it was believed that a man of very high skill and capacity should be employed in the Supervising Architect's Office and a saving would be effected. That position was created in the public-buildings bill.

Mr. FOWLER. I have no doubt but what a high degree of skill is required there, but I also believe there is a good deal of lapping over in work. I can see no reason why the design for a certain building can not be used in many places instead of making a design for each building.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, they are doing that now.

Mr. FOWLER. That is a recent thing, is it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Within the last two or three years.

Mr. FOWLER. That is what I meant. I shall not make the point of order against the additional $1,000, but I do not think it ought to be carried here, and I do not think that these subordinate places should receive a salary above those of great responsibility, such as the First, Second, Third, and Fourth Assistant Postmasters General.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The recommendation of the Public Buildings Commission, I think, is that the compensation of this position should be increased to $7,500. We are spending about $20,000,000 a year in the construction of public buildings in the United States, and the responsibility, I think, is much greater than that of any of the positions mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois, because a competent man can save a very considerable sum of money every year, while an incompetent man makes the whole building program of the Federal Government almost approach a scandal.

Mr. FOWLER. Why, the efficiency of the Post Office Department ought to be such as to handle more than $300,000,000 economically, because that is the appropriation this year. The gentleman speaks about efficiency——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think, however, that the technical knowledge required by men engaged in construction commands a higher compensation than other positions. Men do not seek such positions because of the honor as they do the other places. They seek them because it is part of their professional work.

Mr. FOWLER. And because they are remunerative.

Mr. MADDEN. This is a real workman's job.

Mr. FOWLER. I know that, and that is the reason I am not going to make the point of order. If it was a playhouse job, I would make the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. This is a workman's job, and really I do not know of a job that requires greater technical knowledge.

Mr. FOWLER. It does, and we want to get the very highest order of efficiency in these public servants, and they ought to have a good salary.

Mr. MADDEN. You can not employ that kind of a man without paying him good compensation for the responsibility and the knowledge required by it.

Mr. FOWLER. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. You do not have to get that same kind of talent for an Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. FOWLER. I am sorry I can not agree with my colleague.

Mr. MADDEN. A man to be appointed one of the Assistant Postmasters General requires no technical knowledge whatever; all they need is to be good looking and have some political influence.

Mr. FOWLER. My experience is that the heads and chiefs of nearly everything, like the chief cook, is always a good-looking fellow or a good-looking woman, but the subordinates are really the ones who have the efficiency and have the lash put to them if they do not do the work correctly.

Mr. MADDEN. They are the men who tell the superior officer how to do it.

Mr. FOWLER. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, OPERATING EXPENSES.

Operating force: For such personal services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary in connection with the care, maintenance, and repair of all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department (except as hereinafter provided), together with the grounds thereof and the equipment and furnishings therein, including assistant custodians, janitors, watchmen, laborers, and charwomen; engineers, firemen, elevator conductors, coal passers, electricians, dynamo tenders, lampists, and wiremen; and for the mechanical labor force in connection with said buildings, including carpenters, plumbers, steam fitters, machinists, and painters, but in no case shall the rates of compensation for such mechanical labor force be in excess of the rates current at the time and in the place where such services are employed, $2,600,000: Provided, That the foregoing appropriation shall be available for use in connection with all public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, including the customhouse at Washington, D. C., but not including any other public building within the District of Columbia, and exclusive of marine hospitals, quarantine stations, mints, branch mints, and assay offices.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-three gentlemen are present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ASHBROOK, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and that 223 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and that he presented a list of the absentees for printing in the Journal.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Some two years ago I introduced in the House a bill for the purpose of creating a national park out of the territory in which Mount Lassen and Cinder Cone are located. I have been attempting to get that matter out of the committee——

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order against that. It is not in order.

Mr. RAKER. I know it is not; but I thought I would try it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is not speaking to the paragraph of the bill under consideration. I have no desire to enforce the point of order unless it is the intention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to enforce it against this side. I am not willing to let gentlemen on that side discuss questions out of order and then have the rule enforced against Members on this side.

Mr. GARNER. I think the gentleman ought to protect that side of the House against violations of the rule, and we will do so on this side.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not object to this, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] speaks so seldom that I thought it would be all right now.

Mr. MANN. That is not sufficient for me. I want to know whether the gentleman is going to enforce the rule on gentlemen on this side of the House, because if he is I am going to enforce it against gentlemen on that side of the House. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, under the point of order made by the distinguished leader on the other side of the House, I withdraw my motion to amend, as the point of order is undoubtedly well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

For district superintendents of life-saving and lifeboat stations and houses of refuge, as follows: Maine and New Hampshire, 1, $2,200; Massachusetts, 1, $2,200; Rhode Island and Fishers Island, 1, $2,000; Long Island, 1, $2,200; New Jersey, 1, $2,200; Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, 1, $2,200; Virginia and North Carolina, 1, $2,200; South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, 1, $1,900; Gulf of Mexico, 1, $2,000; Lakes Ontario and Erie, 1, $2,200; Lakes Huron and Superior, 1, $2,200; Lake Michigan, 1, $2,200; California, Oregon, Washington, and Alaska, 1, $2,200; 13 in all, $27,900.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that item at the bottom of page 29. I would like to ask the gentleman if the title of the superintendents of life-saving stations have been changed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have not been changed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman carries the title here, "district superintendents of life-saving and lifeboat stations and houses of refuge." When were those words added to the title of superintendents of life-saving stations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is in the current law.

Mr. MANN. No; it has never been carried in the current law heretofore.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have changed the arrangement; that is all.

Mr. MANN. I understand the arrangement has been changed, and I have no objection to that, but the title used to be, and I think still is, "district superintendents of life-saving stations." There is one to each district. Now, you carry it as "district superintendents of life-saving and lifeboat stations and houses of refuge." It is true that these district superintendents have under their control some lifeboat stations and some houses of refuge, but I think that is not their title, and this is merely descriptive of the title of those officials.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Formerly it was "district superintendent of life-saving stations, as follows." Then we would enumerate the life-saving stations.

Mr. MANN. It should still be "for district superintendents of life-saving stations."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then would come a "superintendent of a house of refuge"—that would be another title—and then "for life-saving and lifeboat stations." There are titles corresponding to that. Some have no houses of refuge. The arrangement is merely changed. I do not think it affects in any way the substance of it, but it eliminates the repetition of the words.

Mr. MANN. I understand they have under their control certain life-saving stations, certain lifeboat stations, and certain houses of refuge; but the title of the officer is "district superintendent of life-saving stations."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that in the current law there was this: "For district superintendent of life-saving station."

Mr. MANN. That is the title of the officer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is one.

Mr. MANN. That is proper. That is the one you make appropriation for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. "District superintendent" is the title of the office.

Mr. MANN. "District superintendent of life-saving station" is the title of the office, and it covers, for instance, the life-saving station and the house of refuge on the coast of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. But you do not wish to change the title of the office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we do not wish to change it.

Mr. MANN. You have changed it in this appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In order to eliminate the repetition of certain words this modification was made, and the item was submitted to the department officials, and they said it would not affect the occupants of the places.

Mr. MANN. I understand. I suppose that is true, and I should say that the district superintendent of a life-saving station carried in this bill, for example, for the life-saving station in the South Carolina district, would still have jurisdiction over the houses of refuge. I am not going to insist upon the point of order.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his point of order?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARNER. What is the object of having different salaries for similar places in this paragraph?

Mr. MANN. The salaries are fixed by statute, I will say to the gentleman—a very good reason.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The compensation is fixed by statute, and I think it depends upon the importance of the station or of the district, rather. Some districts have a number of stations and a great deal of work and others have not so much.

Mr. GARNER. One of them coming under my observation is the district of the Gulf of Mexico. I do not know who the superintendent is, when he was appointed, or where he comes from, but I know he covers as much territory and puts in as many hours as the superintendent of any district in the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The cost of living is cheaper there.

Mr. GARNER. That can not be the reason. The gentleman's reason for the difference in the salary does not hold good. He first said it was the importance of the station and the importance of the work done.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The coast there is not so dangerous.

Mr. MADDEN. It is protected by Angora wool. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. It is not protected by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. He is far distant from it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a matter that should be taken up with the committee that has jurisdiction of the subject. We can not fix the compensation.

Mr. GARNER. I wanted to see if it was the importance of the station and the amount of work done or the energy of the Congressman representing the district.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not, because if it depended upon the ingenuity of the Congressmen and their activity I am sure the Gulf station would have a much higher compensation than any other. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The hardships on the Gulf coast are not as great as those at other stations.

Mr. GARNER. I am not convinced by the statement of the gentleman from New York. In glancing over this bill I find in stations close together a difference in salary of as much as $200. It occurs to me that in arranging those salaries it might be dependent on the activity of the Congressman representing the district.

Mr. MANN. I assure the gentleman from Texas that the activities of the Congressmen had nothing whatever to do with the case. Those salaries were fixed by a bill which was framed and reported out by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, based largely on the work and the hardships that these men perform. They are sometimes transferred, but not often, from one station to another. They used to be. Their salaries were fixed upon the recommendation of the department at the time they were fixed.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says it depends upon the work and the hardships. What does he term "the work and the hardships"?

Mr. MANN. I will say this: It is much less of a hardship to be the superintendent of a life-saving station on the Gulf coast than it is on the coast of Maine.

Mr. GARNER. Yes. But here on the Virginia and North Carolina coast, 300 miles away, with the same climatic conditions, you have a $2,000 job and a $2,200 job.

Mr. MANN. We have in Virginia and North Carolina one of the worst coasts there is anywhere. In the case of the superintendent of the district covering Virginia and North Carolina the salary is $2,200.

Mr. GARNER. No; $1,900.

Mr. MANN. Two thousand two hundred dollars. The gentleman from Texas can not tell me that, because I know otherwise.

Mr. GARNER. Virginia and North Carolina, $2,200; South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, $1,900.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman admits that the coast along South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida is a simple and safe coast to take care of, compared with the North Carolina coast?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For establishing new life-saving stations and lifeboat stations on the sea and lake coasts of the United States, authorized by law, $25,000, to be available until expended.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert after the word "States" and before the word "authorized," in line 20, page 31, the word "when."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 31, line 20, by inserting after the word "State" the word "when."

Mr. MANN. It should come before the word "authorized," after the comma.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These are for the life-saving stations that are already authorized.

Mr. MANN. It should read:

When authorized by law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are certain stations already authorized.

Mr. MANN. That would be covered. I do not mean when authorized hereafter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. I think the fact is that under this appropriation, which is intended to provide for the construction of life-saving stations that are authorized by law, they use the language—

Authorized by law—

as meaning authorized by this appropriation, and go ahead and construct a station without any authorization of law whatever.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There has not been any instance of that character.

Mr. MANN. Where were the new stations authorized last year? I know there have been cases where stations have been constructed, with no previous authorization of law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is one station at Seagate, N. Y.

Mr. MANN. When was that authorized by law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are three stations authorized—one at Seagate, N. Y.; one at Mackinac Island, Mich.; and one at Half Moon Bay, Cal. They were authorized in the act of August 24, 1912. There is another for Liberty Island. No attempt has been made to select a site there. There is a balance of $37,000, and with the $25,000 appropriated in this bill they expect to complete the four stations.

Mr. MANN. This item is carried every year, is it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not every year.

Mr. MANN. How were these three stations authorized in 1912?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were carried in some bill reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct, but I doubt it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We do not provide for them unless they are authorized.

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman does not endeavor to provide for unauthorized stations, but some stations have been constructed without any authorization of law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In 1906 there was an appropriation of $30,000. The next appropriation was in 1911, of $20,000. There was one in 1912 of $20,000. There was none for 1913. For the current year there is an appropriation of $20,000.

Mr. MANN. For the current year, $20,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. They have an unexpended balance of $37,000. The estimate was for $62,000, to complete these four stations. There are some other stations which have been authorized, some of them as far back as 1872.

Mr. MANN. Certainly the committee does not intend to appropriate money to build stations that were authorized in 1872.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. That is one of the reasons why appropriations have been eliminated in certain years. The act approved August 24, 1912, provides for the establishment of one life-saving station on the larger of the two Liberty Islands situated at the entrance to Machias Bay, Me.; one life-saving station at Half Moon Bay, Cal.; one life-saving station at Mackinac Island, Mich.; and one life-saving station at or near Seagate, N. Y.; and it provides for increased facilities at the quarantine station at Portland, Me.

Mr. MANN. They are to cost about $15,000 for each station?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is estimated they will cost about that. I am inclined to think that some of them will cost more than $15,000.

Mr. MANN. Which would provide for a pretty fanciful life-saving station.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The increased cost of some of the stations is due to the fact that because of the character of the landing place it is necessary to have somewhat expensive launching ways. When there is no beach, it is necessary to launch into deep water from ways, or by some apparatus, and the statement is made that the cost is thus increased considerably. Most of the stations consist of a single building with the life-saving apparatus occupying the ground floor and the living quarters in the upper portion. A good many stations, however, have a boathouse separate from the building in which the crew resides. That seems to be a more desirable condition when it is possible.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

For pay and allowances of captain commandant and officers of that rank, senior captains, captains, lieutenants, engineer in chief and officers of that rank, captains of engineers, lieutenants of engineers, 2 constructors, not exceeding 14 cadets and cadet engineers, who are hereby authorized, 2 civilian instructors, and pilots employed, and rations for pilots; for pay of warrant and petty officers, ships' writers, buglers, seamen, oilers, firemen, coal heavers, water tenders, stewards, cooks, and boys, and for rations for the same; for allowance for clothing for enlisted men; for fuel for vessels, and outfits for the same; ship chandlery and engineers' stores for the same; actual traveling expenses or mileage, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for officers traveling on duty under orders from the Treasury Department; commutation of quarters; for maintenance of vessels in the protection of the seal fisheries in Bering Sea and the other waters of Alaska, and the enforcement of the provisions of law in Alaska; for maintenance of vessels in enforcing the provisions of the acts relating to the anchorage of vessels in the ports of New York and Chicago, and in the Kennebec River, and the movements and anchorage of vessels in St. Marys River; for temporary leases and improvement of property for revenue-cutter purposes; not exceeding $5,000 for the improvement of the depot for the service at Arundel Cove, Md.; not exceeding $150 for medals for excellence in marksmanship; contingent expenses, including wharfage, towage, dockage, freight, advertising, surveys, labor, and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads, $2,350,000: Provided, That hereafter ration supplies may be purchased by the cabin, wardroom, and warrant officers' messes and payment therefor made in cash to the commissary officer; the prices to be charged for such supplies shall not be less than the invoice prices, and the cash received from such sales shall be accounted for on the ration return and may be expended for the general mess.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish the gentleman from New York would give us some information about the proviso.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Capt. Berthold stated that the law provides rations for the crew. Sometimes the ships have to leave port suddenly and there is not sufficient mess stores in the cabin and wardroom for the officers' mess, for which the officers pay and the Government does not. On such occasions they draw from the general mess maintained for the seamen, for which the Government does pay. When they do that the money must be turned in as miscellaneous receipts, but it curtails to that extent the appropriation for the mess for the crew. This is to enable the officers when at sea or on the vessel to purchase from the stores for the crew, and that that money may be utilized in replacing the stores so purchased.

Mr. MANN. Is it not almost invariable that the officers who make the purchase of seamen's mess will purchase in many cases such articles as they desire for the officers and carry these purchases on the ship, and then if the officers want them they take them, and if they do not want them they do not take them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be subject to some abuses, but I doubt it. It amounts to a very little sum in the course of a year. From the explanation given, it seems to be very desirable that the officers be given this opportunity, and at the same time by taking these stores from the crew's mess the fund available for the mess for the crew ought not to be diminished.

Mr. MANN. It would amount to a very small sum now, and the reason given is a very good one, if it does not lead to the system of having all the supplies for the officers' mess purchased as a part of the seamen's mess and carried on board the ship and delivered to the officers as they want them, because they have no longer any reason for not making the purchases, and the money that comes in will be available for that purchase.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Perhaps some provision might be inserted to guard against abuse, but the showing made by the head of the Revenue-Cutter Service seemed to indicate that it was a desirable provision for them. It differs from the situation in regard to the Army and the Navy officers who purchase supplies on shore. It is only intended for use on the ships.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Punishment for violations of internal-revenue laws: For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violations, $150,000; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make a detailed statement to Congress once in each year as to how he has expended this sum, and also a detailed statement of all miscellaneous expenditures in the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to come in at the end of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 35, at the end of line 21, by inserting the following: "Provided further, That the Attorney General is hereby authorized and directed to pay, as rewards, 10 per cent of any sum which may be recovered in the nature of penalties, fines, forfeitures, or otherwise to the person or persons who shall first furnish evidence of the violation of any of the antitrust laws, resulting in the recovery of penalties, fines, forfeitures, or recoveries."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not authorized by law and it is not germane to this part of the bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is clearly subject to the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the amendment may be subject to a point of order, but it deals with the same question that the paragraph itself deals with; that is, the question of paying for information leading to violations of the customs-revenue laws. The paragraph is subject to a point of order. If the amendment is germane to the subject matter, no point of order against it will lie. I would be very glad if the chairman of this committee would consent to the adoption of the amendment. I think it is necessary.

Mr. MADDEN. It is a good amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. It is a splendid amendment. If the distinguished gentleman from New York will withhold his point of order, I think I can convince him that it is necessary and that it should be adopted here.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is all the more reason why I should insist upon the point of order.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is a student of economics, and I know he is anxious to reduce expenditures of this Government, and also is more than anxious to reduce the violations of law committed in this country. This amendment will not only aid him as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in cutting down expenditures, but it will prove to be a source of revenue to the Government.

Mr. MADDEN. This would open up a new industry for employment, would it not?

Mr. FOWLER. Indeed, I might say it would open up a new industry of such magnitude as to give employment to all idle prosecutors of crime and give them an opportunity to earn their salaries. It will reveal graft in high places, locate the hiding places of big criminals, and expose the unlawful methods by which the Government has been robbed of millions. It will expose a picture of crime which will not only shock the wisdom of the gentleman from New York, but will astonish the world to know that such conduct has been tolerated. Its benefits to the country can not be estimated. The criminal only should oppose its adoption. The innocent should encourage it, for it will protect the Government and the citizen alike. Hideous grafter, how did you get rich quick? Where is your hiding place? Who are you allies? This amendment is able to answer all these questions.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Money laundry machines: For all miscellaneous expenses in connection with the installation and maintenance of money laundry machines, including repairs and purchase of supplies, for machines at Washington, D. C., and in the various subtreasury offices, $9,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish the gentleman might give us some information about this item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, about a year and a half or two years ago a machine was devised for the purpose of laundering Treasury notes so that they might be reissued instead of being destroyed. Those machines have been put into operation in several of the subtreasuries and some of them are in operation in the city of Washington. It was not found necessary to use as many as originally had been anticipated. They have reissued about 28,000,000 laundered notes in the past year, which is equivalent to 7,000,000 sheets of special paper, distinctive paper, purchased for Treasury notes. So far as they have been utilized the machines have been found to be very efficient, and their use has resulted in cleaner currency being kept in circulation, and has eliminated the necessity of engraving about twenty-eight to thirty million notes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we have carried an item in the legislative bill at different times, I think, for these expenses at the subtreasuries, have we not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this item was formerly carried in the legislative bill, and it was transferred to this bill this year so as to be carried in connection with the work of the printing and issuing of Treasury notes. The $9,000 carried here is for the purchase of materials required in the operation of the machines, the peculiar chemical or soap, or whatever it is, that is used to wash the notes, and the oil and other materials necessary for the operations of the machines. They are not using the machines to full capacity, because the number of notes that have been turned in fit to be reissued has not been sufficiently large to justify laundering and reissuing, but they have been able to launder and reissue a number of notes that justifies the maintenance of the machine.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GOULDEN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. PERKINS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Distinctive paper for United States securities: For distinctive paper for United States securities, including transportation, traveling, laundry, and other necessary expenses, salaries for not more than 10 months of not exceeding 1 register, 2 assistant registers, 5 counters, 5 watchmen, and 1 skilled laborer, and expenses of officer detailed from the Treasury, $400,000.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the Chairman a question about this paragraph. In line 18, among other items, there is one for laundry. What does that item mean? Is that for the laundry of the wearing apparel of these traveling men in the employ of the Government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is the laundering of the rags and cloths.

Mr. CULLOP. It does not read in that way. The item reads:

Including transportation, traveling, laundry, and other necessary expenses, salaries for not more than 10 months of not exceeding 1 register, 2 assistant registers, 5 counters, 5 watchmen, and 1 skilled laborer, and expenses of officer detailed from the Treasury, $400,000.

I do not think that it is a necessary item of expense where some agent of the Government is traveling to pay his laundry expenses. His traveling expenses are paid and his board. If he were here in Washington, he would be on the same salary, and his laundry bill would not be any greater when he is away or any more reason why he should pay it. It is unfair to the Government and unjust to the people that we should pay his laundry bills, if that is what it means, and I think it does.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think the transportation there refers to individuals?

Mr. CULLOP. I am asking the Chairman. It says:

Including transportation, traveling, laundry, and other necessary expenses.

What else could it mean?

Mr. MANN. It says:

For distinctive paper for United States securities, including transportation, traveling, laundry,"

And so forth.

Mr. CULLOP. How would they pay the traveling expenses of distinctive paper? This item refers to what follows and not what precedes it, and clearly refers to the traveling expenses connected with certain named employees.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, it includes some employees, too.

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly, it is employees. It refers to their expenses and nothing else; that is too plain for dispute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. These men are sent to the mill in Massachusetts where the paper is made. If the gentleman will pardon me for a moment, I will get the exact information.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman is looking up that matter we might consider the question of transportation. In these bills somewhere is hidden authority, or at least so construed by the auditor for the various departments, to buy all of the automobiles necessary for every subhead there is in the Government, and the number of automobiles in this District used for purposes not intended by the Congress has become almost a public scandal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a recent decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury which was printed in the hearings, if I recollect correctly, on the urgent deficiency bill, in which decision, citing a provision of the Revised Statutes requiring him to construe the word "vehicle" as covering every form of land transportation, he held that automobiles could be purchased.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order of no quorum. I can only count——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point of no quorum is dilatory. The gentleman made one a few moments ago.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. It has been over an hour ago, and I count only 30 Members in the Chamber.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will withhold the point of order until we get this matter of dirty linen cleaned up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. CULLOP. There seems to be a dispute over there as to whether there is any reference to dirty linen; the gentleman from Illinois seems to think not.

Mr. MANN. That is contrary to the ethics of the Democratic Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and the gentleman from New York makes the point of order that that point of order is dilatory. The bill is now being considered under the five-minute rule, and amendments are being offered and voted upon. The Constitution requires a quorum to do business, and the Chair stated yesterday afternoon——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to call the attention of the Chair, so he will have it correct in the RECORD, that the Constitution does not make any reference about the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CULLOP. The rules of the House do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The rules of the House provide that, and I take it it is the spirit of the Constitution. The Chair yesterday sustained a point of order of a character similar to this while general debate was in progress, but when actual business is being done, with amendments being offered and voted upon, the Chair feels that the benefit of the doubt should be given to the point of no quorum, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-seven gentlemen are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARTLETT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called, and thereupon 218 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he reported herewith the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union reports that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to be called; whereupon 218 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he presents herewith the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], I desire to state that in 1910 in the preparation of the sundry civil bill for the fiscal year 1911 the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Norton, when before the committee, explained that the word "laundry" in the paragraph was for the purpose of paying for the laundering of towels used by the employees and the sheets and pillow cases used on the watchmen's beds.

We maintain special watchmen at the mill to guard everything in connection with the manufacture of this paper. They had been paying these expenses for 30 years out of this particular appropriation, when the Comptroller of the Treasury held that they were not allowable without specific authority. And in that year the word "laundry" was inserted in order to continue the payment for the laundering of towels, sheets, and pillowcases. It is not intended for the personal laundry of the employees.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman where this mill is situated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is located in Massachusetts, at Dalton.

Mr. GARNER. Can the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] state to the committee that no part of this appropriation is used for the purpose of paying the laundry of employees of the Government when they travel?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not say that, because I do not know whether under the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury laundry is allowable as a traveling expense. This wording was included in the provision to take care specifically of the expenses of the character indicated. So far as I am aware, it was never intended to be otherwise.

Mr. GARNER. It makes no difference what the intention of the committee is, if the committee authorizes the care of laundry for the Treasury Department, and it is used for that purpose, this committee ought to guard against the uses of money in a way not intended by Congress. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSON] just remarked in an undertone that they had construed this language to mean for the payment of laundry used in traveling expenses.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The "gentleman from South Carolina" did not say that, but the "gentleman from South Carolina" did say that where the traveling expenses of a Government employee are provided for they do allow laundry.

Mr. GARNER. Let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina if they use this language they could not pay the laundry bill of an employee out of this appropriation, because it says "including transportation, traveling, laundry, and other necessary expenses"?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Unless it is included under the word "traveling," it would not come, in my opinion, under "laundry." The Comptroller of the Treasury in ruling upon these questions invariably examines the record made before the committee which makes the appropriations, and does not permit, as a rule, money to be used for a purpose which it is clearly indicated was not contemplated when provisions were framed.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will permit, he will remember that some years ago—within the last three or four years—the question was up before the House on one of the appropriation bills, wherein it was claimed that some of the appropriations under the word "laundry" had been applied to paying the laundry bills of individuals, for the laundry of their personal wearing apparel. And if that is so, that is certainly an abuse of the appropriation and is diverting it to a purpose for which it was never intended. Now, would the gentleman have any objection to this kind of an amendment, namely, after the end of the paragraph insert:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall apply to the payment of the private laundry bills of any of the employees or officials of this department.

In my judgment, that would be appropriate, in order to prevent any abuse in this matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not think it is necessary to attach it to this appropriation.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman will concede that as it now stands it is subject to this abuse? This would prevent any diversion of this fund from the purpose for which it is made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not, unless they construe laundry to be a legitimate traveling expense; and if that be the decision of the Comptroller of the Treasury, there is no reason why the register and two assistant registers, five counters, five watchmen, and one skilled laborer employed at this particular place should have a rule applied to them that does not apply to all Government officials who travel. It would be somewhat unfortunate to single them out.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman will concede, I suppose, that it ought to apply to all Government officials? You can not make such a construction of traveling expenses that would include the laundry of the wearing apparel of the individual. That is no part of the traveling expenses. To so construe it would be ridiculous.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have construed as a legitimate charge under traveling expenses a charge for pressing trousers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will ask for recognition in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the point of order is reserved upon the paragraph.

Mr. CULLOP. No; I moved to strike out the last word. That was the motion, instead of a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask to be recognized in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was calling the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that a few years ago a member of the Fine Arts Commission included in his account of traveling expenses an item for pressing several pairs of trousers. The item was submitted to the Comptroller of the Treasury twice. On the second occasion he held that it was a proper item of disbursement to come within the construction of the term "traveling expenses."

Mr. CULLOP. I will ask the gentleman from New York if he does not think that was very far-fetched for a statutory construction? It could not be approved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think perhaps that a member of the Fine Arts Commission would naturally have, as a necessary part of his traveling expenses, charges for the pressing of his trousers more frequently than I myself might find necessary. This word "laundry," however, is to cover the specific work to which I have called attention. I do not believe that it is necessary to add anything else. It covers sheets and pillowcases and towels of five watchmen and one skilled laborer, and five counters of distinctive paper and one register and his two assistants.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question there, if he will permit. Are these watchmen employed in Washington, or are they employed in Massachusetts, at the place where this mill is located?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are employed at the mill.

Mr. CULLOP. Then they are not sent from Washington?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think so.

Mr. CULLOP I would like to ask the gentleman from New York, in this connection, who are the men, and what are the positions they hold, who are sent up from this city to Massachusetts, where this mill is located, to superintend or look after this part of the Government's business?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think, but I am not certain, that it is the register, his two assistants, and the five counters.

Mr. CULLOP. Then the five watchmen and the one skilled laborer mentioned in this paragraph are persons who live up there where the mill is located? Is that correct?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think so, but I am not certain about it.

Mr. CULLOP. It seems to me, in the matter of economy in the administration of this branch of the Government work——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is, but I did not inquire about it.

Mr. CULLOP. If they are employed up there in this character of labor, I think it would be a considerable saving to the Government. It would be an economy so far as the Government is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Compensation in lieu of moieties: For compensation in lieu of moieties in certain cases under the customs revenue laws, $50,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DAVENPORT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11040. An act to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis.

ALSTON G. DAYTON.

Mr. NEELEY of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. NEELEY] rises to a question of privilege. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. NEELEY of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, by virtue of my office as a Member of the House of Representatives I hereby impeach Alston G. Dayton, judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present, and the gentleman from New York moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 10, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], both of whom are paired. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in the shape of a substitute for the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I suppose it would be in order to move to amend the original amendment proposed by the committee, in order to perfect it before the vote is taken, and for that purpose I submit an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. It is to strike out from the original amendment certain words and to insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will state his point of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The point of order is that there is a committee amendment pending to the bill now. There is also offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment, and therefore any amendment——

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Connecticut please speak a little louder?

Mr. LODGE. I think the amendment should be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to make the point of order. The point of order is that the amendment can not be offered at present, and I understood the Senator from Utah to offer the amendment now. If he simply asks for a reading of it, and that it then be laid aside to be offered in future, I have no objection to that course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment can be read, the Senator from Connecticut reserving all points of order against it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The amendment is moved as an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment, the Senator from Connecticut reserving all points of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not desire to have the point of order reserved. The Senator from Utah moves that the amendment be adopted. That is an offer of an amendment in the third degree which I——

Mr. GALLINGER. He can not move it until it has been read. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be impossible for the Chair to pass on the point of order until after the amendment has been read. It will be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. An amendment of that nature is an amendment in the third degree.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Utah proposes, on page 2, line 11, to strike out of the committee amendment the words:

Or affecting any treaty or other right possessed by the United States.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

The right of the United States to discriminate in favor of the ships of commerce of its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic which may be imposed for the use of the Panama Canal, but, on the contrary, such right is hereby reasserted.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted, I should like to say a word in regard to the point of order made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], which I think is clearly correct. The motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is to perfect the original amendment offered by the committee; that is, he is applying to that amendment the rule in regard to perfecting a passage of a bill which it is proposed to strike out. Where the motion is to strike out and insert, we have a right, under our rules and under general parliamentary law, to perfect both the portion which it is proposed to strike out and the words which it is proposed to insert. There is no proposition here to strike out anything, because there is nothing to strike out. The amendment which is offered by the committee is like any other amendment. It is an amendment to the bill. The fact that it is a committee amendment gives it, in a parliamentary sense, no privilege. It is printed in the bill merely as a matter of convenience, just as we give committee amendments, by unanimous consent, the right of precedence in considering a bill, as a matter of convenience, but that does not alter their character. They are simply amendments offered to the bill, to be added or inserted. You can not strike this committee amendment out because it is not a part of the bill yet.

Mr. President, in dealing with this question, the Senate has no special rule. We therefore come under the parliamentary law as laid down in Jefferson's Manual, and which is general parliamentary law apart from the manual. It is on page 116:

If an amendment be moved to an amendment, it is admitted; but it would not be admitted in another degree, to wit, to amend an amendment to an amendment of a main question. This would lead to too much embarrassment. The line must be drawn somewhere, and usage has drawn it after the amendment to the amendment.

Now, what is included under the language of Jefferson's Manual, which is also general parliamentary law? The main question is the bill. The amendment to the main question is the committee amendment. The amendment to the amendment of the main question is the substitute proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. To offer to amend either the committee amendment or the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina is obnoxious to the objection that it is an amendment in the third degree. It must be constantly kept in mind that this is not a case of striking out and inserting.

In the House of Representatives the principle I have just stated is fully recognized, but they make an additional provision. That is a provision of their own rules, not general parliamentary law. They provide, first, that after an amendment is offered to an amendment another amendment can not be offered because it is in the third degree. Then they go on and add a provision that if a substitute is offered for an amendment, that substitute and one perfecting amendment to the substitute may also be in order. That is, under the rule of the House four amendments may be pending at the same time; but the House fully recognizes that this is not general parliamentary law, because they make a special provision for it.

The House rule was formulated in 1880, but it embodied an old practice. We have no such rule. We are proceeding under general parliamentary law as laid down in Jefferson's Manual and in other books of authority on parliamentary law. In the Senate only two amendments can be pending, instead of four, as the House rule specially provides. The number of amendments pending is the test of the degree of the amendment. Two, the committee and the Simmons amendments, are now pending. There can not be a third pending.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, it is not exactly clear to me. Would the substitute offered for the text be in the second degree for the whole provision?

Mr. LODGE. There being an amendment in the nature of a substitute offered, under the House rule one amendment to that amendment is in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This amendment would be in order in the House.

Mr. LODGE. One moment. Under the House rules a substitute may be offered for the entire amendment, and to that substitute one perfecting amendment is in order. Therefore you may have pending the original amendment and an amendment to it and the substitute and an amendment to the substitute—four. But that provision about the substitute is purely a House provision. It is not general parliamentary law and it is not the rule of this body.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for just a moment? I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah does not propose to amend the substitute, but proposes to amend the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. But it is an amendment to the amendment of the committee just the same as that offered by the Senator from North Carolina. It does not make any difference whether the second amendment is in the nature of a substitute or not, under general parliamentary law, and under the rule in the manual, there is a second amendment pending, and it is of no consequence whether it is a perfecting amendment or a substitute. There is one amendment offered to the amendment now. No other amendment can be offered to the committee amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator let me ask him a question there? The Senator from North Carolina has proposed an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Utah has done exactly the same thing.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Can there be two pending amendments before the Senate in the same parliamentary status at the same time?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not, under the rule of the Senate. It makes no difference under the rule of Jefferson's Manual and general parliamentary law what the amendment is, whether it is a perfecting amendment, as it is usually called, or an amendment in the nature of a substitute. It is an amendment to the amendment. The Senator from Utah offers another amendment to the original amendment. That, of course, is excluded. It is an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I know the authority with which the Senator speaks upon this question, but has not this precise thing been done a number of times during this session?

Mr. LODGE. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. BORAH. It has to my knowledge.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If we have done it, we have done wrong. But I want to say, if the Senator from Kansas will allow me, I gave this subject some careful examination yesterday. I took the trouble to go over to the House and consult the gentleman who, I think, is the ablest parliamentarian now living in this country, and that is Mr. HINDS, whose familiarity with House provisions and parliamentary law generally everyone knows is very great. I went over this whole subject with him, and especially the House rule with which he is most familiar.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. We all recognize the Senator's authority on parliamentary law, but can he give us a concise definition——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We can not hear the Senator over here.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask the Senator if he can give a concise definition as to what an amendment in the second degree is?

Mr. LODGE. The main question is the bill. I use the language of the manual. The main question is the bill. The committee amendment is amendment No. 1. Any amendment to that amendment is in order and is No. 2, but any further amendment, whether substitute or perfecting, is amendment No. 3, and must be excluded at that stage; but if the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is adopted, or if it is rejected, the amendment remains open to indefinite amendment as before. The amendment never passes in committee beyond the stage where it can be amended until it ceases to be an amendment.

When it ceases to be an amendment by the body placing it in the bill, then it can not be amended any further in the committee stage, but if we substitute the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] for the committee amendment, that would be open to successive amendments of any different kind from those already passed upon.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the committee amendment were now a part of the bill, then the last proposed Simmons amendment would be in the nature of a motion to strike out and insert, would it not?

Mr. LODGE. It would be a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; and in that event the motion which I now make would be in order.

Mr. LODGE. Beyond doubt.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator this question: When an amendment is proposed to a bill, is it not in order to move to strike out words from that amendment and to insert other words?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; and the Senator from North Carolina has done it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Well, then, if that is so, upon what theory does the Senator limit the language of Rule XVIII, which is:

But pending a motion to strike out and insert——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, wait. The rule continues—the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this question is not debatable. We are wasting a lot of time here. The Chair can decide.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Chair, as I understand, has indicated that he did not object to being enlightened.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not necessary for the Chair to object. Any Senator can object; any Senator can make the point of order that debate is out of order on an undebatable question.

Mr. LODGE. I should be glad to reply to the Senator's question, of course, but the point of order having been made no further debate is in order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I may be heard a moment by the indulgence of the Chair, I should like to be heard.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Chair desires to have information, it certainly is in order to give it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been the practice that if the Chair desires he can hear discussions of points of order, and the Chair will be very glad to hear the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to be heard a moment before the matter is disposed of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What was the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Vice President has frequently ruled that when the occupant of the chair desires to hear a point of order discussed he could do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I hope the Chair will not desire it very long. We are wasting a lot of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will be reasonable in connection with that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question which I was submitting to the Senator from Massachusetts was this: The Senator from Massachusetts concedes that where an amendment is pending as this committee amendment is pending, it would be in order to move to strike out any words from that amendment and to insert other words. That is precisely the motion which has been made, as it seems to me.

Mr. LODGE. That is the motion of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts is, Upon what theory he narrows what appears to be the very broad terms of Rule XVIII? The rule reads:

But pending a motion to strike out and insert—

It does not say, "Pending a motion to strike out from a bill and insert something."

Mr. LODGE. Because, Mr. President, the motion to strike out and insert does not apply to anything but the bill. You are not proposing to strike out anything here; you can not strike out what is not in the bill; you can only strike out of a bill what is in the bill; you can not strike out an amendment that is not in the bill. The striking out and inserting applies beyond any question to the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I think the amendment which I propose is in order. I think the Senator from Massachusetts takes altogether too narrow a view of Rule XVIII, which is perfectly plain, and under which, it seems to me, it is perfectly clear that this amendment is in order.

The House of Representatives has reached the result by one kind of a rule, and we have reached it by another kind of a rule. Rule XVIII of the Senate reads in full as follows:

If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided—

That means any question in debate; it does not mean a question relating to an amendment of the bill, but, as I view it, any question relating to the amendment of a proposed amendment. The rule continues:

But the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert.

Now, it is not clear that thus far in this rule the language is not to be limited to the original provisions of the bill, but that it is to be extended to any proposition which is pending before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Wait a moment. The rule continues—and this is the specific part of it which applies to this question—

But pending a motion to strike out and insert—

Not a motion to strike out something from the bill and to insert something else in the bill; but broadly—pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out—

That is, the original committee amendment being the part to be stricken out—and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I am sure, under general parliamentary law, the words "strike out and insert" apply only to the bill. They are distinguished very plainly. If the Senator will turn to the manual, he will find this:

When it is proposed to amend by inserting a paragraph, or part of one, the friends of the paragraph may make it as perfect as they can by amendments before the question is put for inserting it. * * * In like manner, if it is proposed to amend by striking out a paragraph, the friends of the paragraph—

And so forth.

There is no proposition to strike out here. The proposition here is to add or insert, and that is all. There is nothing to perfect except the amendment itself, and that can be perfected by a series of amendments, but not by more than two pending at one time under our rules.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the difficulty——

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Just a moment. The difficulty with the Senator from Massachusetts is that he treats the illustration of the rule as the rule itself, which it is not.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the rule is to strike out and insert; and I never before heard of applying that to an amendment in any parliamentary body, though I may be wrong about it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Massachusetts is usually right.

Mr. LODGE. I will say, if I may refer to Mr. HINDS by name, that I asked him that particular question, and he said there is no parallel whatever between the two propositions.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course I have great respect for the view of Mr. HINDS, but I do not know how familiar he is with Rule XVIII of the Senate, which naturally controls the question.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. HINDS has spent a great many years, I may say, compiling the precedents in his great work on the rules of the House, in which, I think, he reviews the Senate rules.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, but the Senator from Massachusetts quotes an illustration of the rule as though it were the rule itself. The rule is laid down:

But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out—

May be perfected, and so on.

As illustrating that rule, the Manual speaks of striking a paragraph out of the bill, but that is a mere illustration of the rule; it is not the end of the rule itself. By a parity of reasoning when any other proposition is pending before the Senate, as the original amendment is now pending, the rule applies to that just as it does to a bill.

I call the attention of the Chair to the broad language of the rule. The rule is not limited in any way. The rule applies to a situation of this kind quite as much as it does to the original bill. Here is an amendment proposed by the committee, which is now pending before the Senate and is to be voted on. A motion is made to substitute for that another amendment, the effect of which is to strike out all after the word "Provided" in the original amendment and to insert other language. That is the situation.

The Senator from Massachusetts concedes that such a motion as that is in order. It is in order to move to strike out from this amendment certain words and to insert others; and that is what has been done. Then the question arises, What is the parliamentary situation of that matter? The rule is that, "pending a motion to strike out and insert"—not to strike out and insert in the original bill, but to strike out and insert as to any proposition which is pending before the Senate—"the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence." It seems to me that under that rule the amendment which I propose is in order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask that the Secretary may state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been stated, but the Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, lines 11 and 12——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of what?

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment—it is proposed to strike out the words "any treaty or other right possessed by the United States" and insert the words "the right of the United States to discriminate in favor of the ships of commerce of its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic which may be imposed for the use of the Panama Canal, but, on the contrary, such right is hereby reasserted."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it seems to me perfectly clear that that is a proposition to amend the committee amendment by striking out and inserting. There is already a bill, a committee amendment, and an amendment to the committee amendment, which later amendment to the amendment was proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] now proposes, before the vote is taken upon the amendment to the amendment, to offer an amendment to perfect the committee amendment in another respect from that suggested by the Senator from North Carolina; and, of course, that being an amendment in the third degree, it is absolutely out of order. If not, I have a right to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, and the Senator from New Hampshire can offer an amendment to my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Utah, and we would spend the rest of the year here offering amendments down the line to the other amendments.

The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina as a substitute for the committee amendment, and until that is settled no other amendment is in order either to the bill or to the committee amendment or to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator overlooks the provision of the rule, which is:

But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question.

There it must terminate under the rule; so that the Senator is in error, under the rule, in insisting that we may go further.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am aware that the Senator thinks I am in error, Mr. President, and, of course, I may be in error; but I have not overlooked the rule. I have just read the rule and have had it reread to me by the Senator from Utah, and I do not think the rule applies to this case at all. If it did, it would operate to take down the bars against amendments to amendments.

The trouble with the Senator from Utah, in my opinion, is that he takes the wrong view of that rule in this, that he thinks the question referred to by the rule is an amendment, while it is not; the question under discussion here is the bill. An amendment to the bill has been recommended by the committee, and the Senator from North Carolina has proposed a substitute for that amendment. Now——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator take the same view that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] takes, that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina proposing his last amendment is in substance a motion to strike out the original amendment and to insert his own?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know how the Senator has prepared it or what the language of it is; but, as I understand, it is an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A motion to substitute one thing for another is a motion to strike out the one and insert the other. The Senator from Massachusetts conceded that if it were offered to the language of the bill it would clearly be a motion to strike out and insert. Now, does it alter the character of it because the motion is offered to an amendment instead of to the bill? Is it not still a motion to strike out and insert, no matter what we may call it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The question is whether or not it is an amendment in the third degree; that is the point. The effect of the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to insert his amendment in the bill instead of the committee amendment is in effect a motion to strike out the committee amendment and insert his; but, however that may be, it can not be construed that Rule XVIII is meant to abolish all limitation upon the number of amendments that can be pending at the same time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply want to suggest to the Senator that my motion was a motion to substitute certain language for the committee amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that; but I do not think that alters the essential character of the operation. The motion is in the nature of a substitute, to strike out what is proposed and to substitute in lieu thereof the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. BRISTOW and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, right in line with this question, I want to call the Chair's attention to the RECORD of May 29, pages 9455, 9456, wherein the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] offered an amendment to the naval appropriation bill and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] offered a substitute for that amendment. I addressed the Chair the following inquiry:

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi an amendment in the third degree?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am offering the House language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that, under the last clause of Rule XVIII, "motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence," it comes fairly within the rule. The Senator from Mississippi is seeking to amend the part to be stricken out before the motion is put on striking it out.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then the amendment of the Senator from New York will come later.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me one moment, that is not a parallel case. The amendment offered was to strike out.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. So it is here.

Mr. LODGE. No; the amendment——

Mr. BRISTOW. It was exactly a parallel case.

Mr. LODGE. One moment; let me state the case before the Senator interrupts. The amendment there was to strike out part of the bill, and both were open to amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Massachusetts will give me his attention, the amendment of the committee was to strike out a certain part of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from New York offered an amendment to that amendment to strike out a part of that which the committee had reported to be stricken out in its entirety. That was the amendment of the Senator from New York. Then the Senator from Mississippi offered as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from New York his amendment; which was in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, and the Vice President ruled that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York and the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi could each be perfected under Rule XVIII; and that is exactly what the Senator from Utah is undertaking to do now.

Mr. LODGE. That was a motion to strike out part of the bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. But, if the Senator will pardon me, the committee had an amendment pending which struck out a part of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. It does not make any difference; the motion of the Senator from New York was to strike out part of the bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from New York proposed to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out certain lines.

Mr. LODGE. He may have adopted an erroneous form, but what he proposed to do was to strike out a part of the bill.

Mr. BRISTOW. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will pardon me, upon that occasion my amendment was an amendment to the text of the original House bill. The question before the Senate was the bill as it came from the House. The Senator from New York moved as an amendment to the committee amendment to strike out a certain part of the bill, to strike out a different part, but the Chair ruled that as my amendment was an amendment to the bill and not an amendment to either amendment, it was in order.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is mistaken as to the ruling. The Chair ruled that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi was a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from New York; that they were both separate propositions; and that either could be amended; and we proceeded to vote on the two separate propositions in the nature of perfecting them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has the text before him and I have not, but if the Senator will refer to it, if my memory serves me aright, he will find that the Chair based his ruling upon the ground that I had a right to perfect the language of the original bill before either one of the other amendments was considered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senate has now been proceeding out of order for 40 minutes, and I renew my point of order that this question is not debatable.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator from Nebraska can not interrupt me to make a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will hear discussion of the point of order for a few minutes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I have a right to make that point of order.

Mr. BRISTOW. Whether or not this debate shall continue is wholly within the discretion of the Chair. It is a question for him alone to decide, and he has a right to listen all day if he sees fit to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken, if it is insisted upon by the Senator. The usual custom has been for the Chair to hear discussion on these points of order, but the rule, if insisted upon, states that points of order shall be decided without debate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES. A few days ago, when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was in the chair, he held that I could not interrupt a Senator without his consent in order to raise the highest point of order that can be made—a point of no quorum. I wish to know whether or not it is proper for the Senator from Nebraska to interrupt the Senator from Kansas, without his consent, to make a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that speakers can always be interrupted on points of order. The Secretary will read Rule XX.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not propose to participate in debate on the point of order, but I submit for the RECORD that while the Chair patiently and courteously listens to debate, it is not in order for another Senator to call a Senator to order. It is fully within the province of the Chair to listen to debate or not to listen to debate, and the Chair can terminate it at any moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read Rule XX.

The SECRETARY. Rule XX, on page 19 of the Standing Rules of the Senate, is as follows:

QUESTIONS OF ORDER.

A question of order may be raised at any stage of the proceedings, except when the Senate is dividing, and, unless submitted to the Senate, shall be decided by the presiding officer without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say frankly that I wish to discuss the question of the point of order but a few minutes, not very long; and if the Chair is willing——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the point of order is insisted upon, the Chair must determine it without debate, under Rule XX. The Chair is willing to hear from the Senator upon it, unless objection is raised.

Is there any objection to the Senator discussing the point of order? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I believe under the ruling of the Chair——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I did not understand that the Chair was addressing me. I made my point of order, and insisted on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was addressing the entire Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make the point of order that this is not a debatable question. I think the time has come when the wasting of time in the Senate ought to be drawn to a close.

Mr. SMOOT. Not to embarrass the Chair at all, and to yield to the unreasonable demand of the Senator from Nebraska, I shall say no more, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is satisfied that under general parliamentary law an amendment in the third degree can not be moved. Only one motion to amend the main question and one motion to amend that amendment can be pending at the same time. So the question for the Chair to determine is whether or not the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is an amendment in the third degree.

The proposition before the Senate is House bill 14385. The committee when it reported the bill reported an amendment, which amendment is printed with the bill but is not a part of the bill. It is offered for the consideration of the Senate as a proposed amendment. That is an amendment in the first degree, a distinct proposition.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has offered, not a motion to strike out and insert, but a substitute for the amendment proposed by the committee. That makes two distinct propositions for the Senate to pass upon. That is a second amendment, in the form of a substitute.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has offered an amendment to the amendment offered by the committee. If his amendment were in order, it would have precedence over the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina—that is, if it tended to perfect the original amendment—but precedence can not be given to any amendment unless the amendment is in order.

The amendment submitted by the Senator from Utah is a third proposition, which would leave three amendments pending before the Senate for consideration at the same time to the main question.

The Chair is satisfied that under general parliamentary law, which prevails in this body, on this question an amendment in the third degree is not permissible. Consequently the Chair must sustain the point of order and declare that at this time the amendment is not in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connection may I ask the Chair a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is perfectly willing to answer any question that is suggested by the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt that not the present occupant of the chair, but the Vice President, has ruled at least three times during this session that wherever a substitute for an amendment was offered, either in the first or the second degree, the Senate had a right to perfect either amendment, and that the first amendment had precedence. I simply state that fact and wish to know whether the Chair now rules contrary to that ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that no amendment can have precedence unless it is in order. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah were not of the third degree, it would then have precedence as perfecting the original amendment; but in order to have precedence an amendment must be such an amendment as can be offered under the rules of the Senate. Under the rules of the Senate an amendment in the third degree is not in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware that under our rules an amendment in the third degree is not in order, and if I understand the Chair's ruling it is that wherever there are two amendments offered to the bill there is no right to perfect either one of those amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that where a bill is pending before the Senate and one amendment is offered, when a second amendment is offered that constitutes an amendment in the second degree, and a third amendment is not in order, being in the third degree.

Mr. SMOOT. Whether it be a perfection of the amendment or not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The only exception to this is under Rule XVIII. Where a motion is made to strike out and insert that is considered as one question; but the Senator from Utah has no right to change the motion made by the Senator from North Carolina and make it a motion to strike out and insert when it is not a motion to strike out and insert. Besides, the amendment of the committee is not in the bill and included as a part of it. It is an amendment itself and is not included in the bill.

Mr. STONE. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS and others. Regular order!

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the matter now before the Senate is the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the question before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. I presume we are about ready to vote upon this amendment; but I think we should have, before we vote, a little enlightenment from the Senator as to what this amendment is intended to accomplish.

The amendment which I have before me reads:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain ratified the 21st of February, 1902 or the treaty with the Republic of Panama ratified February 26, 1904, or otherwise to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal, or as in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaty, or otherwise, with respect to the sovereignty over or the ownership, control, and management of said canal and the regulation of the conditions or charges of traffic through the same.

The Senator who offers this amendment stated upon the floor a few days ago that for the United States to exempt her vessels of commerce from tolls while passing through the canal would be a plain violation of the treaty. In view of that statement of the Senator, I wish to ask the Senator what is the meaning of this amendment and what object is sought to be accomplished by it. Does the Senator modify his view that there is a possibility that we may have a right to pass our vessels of commerce through the canal free of tolls; or what is the object of this amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator desire that I shall reply now?

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I desire to yield sufficient time to enable the Senator to reply.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall require only a few minutes.

Mr. President, I do not think it is possible to draft an amendment that is plainer in its purport and its meaning than is this amendment. I drafted this amendment after much consideration and with much care, and if it does not contain a plain expression of its purpose, it is because I am not able to use the English language to express a purpose.

I do not think any Senator can have any doubt as to what the amendment means. I do not understand the Senator from Idaho as expressing any doubt as to what it means; but the Senator asks me how I square this amendment with my position with reference to the right of the United States to exempt its coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, as I understand.

Mr. BORAH. No; not exactly that. What I want to know from the Senator is this: Does the Senator by this amendment mean to assert that the United States has the right to exempt its vessels from tolls passing through the canal?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the issue that is drawn by the several amendments that have been introduced, some by the friends of the bill and some by the opponents of the bill, is a very clear-cut issue. It is whether these amendments, if any are to be adopted, shall reserve to the United States any rights that it may have under these treaties or otherwise, or whether we shall expressly assert the right of the United States hereafter to exempt its vessels from tolls.

The amendment I have introduced is an amendment of reservation of right. It is nothing more and nothing less. It does not assert any right in the United States with respect to these things, but it declares that we reserve any right that the United States may have. It is therefore expressly an amendment of reservation.

The amendment which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has introduced, and some other amendments of like character that have been introduced by those who are opposed to repeal, expressly assert the right of the United States hereafter to exempt its coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. This amendment of mine is a declaration that in repealing this provision of the canal-tolls act we reserve any right that the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain, under the treaty with Panama, or ortside of the treaties with Great Britain and Panama, with respect to the imposition of tolls or the exemption of tolls upon its vessels. The amendments which have been offered in antagonism to this idea assert that notwithstanding we now repeal the act exempting coastwise vessels from tolls, we assert that the United States has that right, and may at any time in the future when it sees fit exempt these vessels from the payment of tolls.

That is the clear-cut issue between the proponents of these several amendments. The friends of repeal present an amendment reserving whatever rights the United States may have. That is to say, it provides that the act of repeal shall not be construed as waiving any rights that the United States may have under these treaties or otherwise. The opponents of repeal offer amendments asserting that the United States has the right under the treaty with Great Britain to make this exemption without giving like exemption to other nations.

These proposed amendments now offered raise the question of whether we want simply to reserve whatever rights the United States may have, whatever rights it may be determined hereafter by diplomacy or by arbitration or otherwise that the United States has shall be reserved, or whether in repealing this act we want to declare that the United States has the right to make the exemption this bill repeals.

That is the issue between the proponents of these diverse amendments.

Now, the Senator asks me a further question, and I should like to answer that now, and then I shall have nothing more to say about it, because I think the proposition is so well understood in this body that it is not necessary that we should spend any great length of time in elaboration or in discussion.

The Senator asks, in view of my position, stated a few days ago, to the effect that in my opinion under the treaty with Great Britain we have no right to exempt our coastwise vessels from tolls without at the same time exempting vessels of other countries, how I could justify the provisions of this amendment reserving whatever right the United States may have in the premises. The Senator very well knows that this debate has developed two lines of opinion, separate and distinct, with respect to this question. Certain Senators who are in favor of the repeal of the act of 1912 have taken the position that the United States has no right under the treaty to exempt these vessels from the payment of tolls without at the same time exempting the vessels of other countries. They have taken the position that we had no right to make that exemption under the treaty, and for that reason they favor the repeal of that act.

There are other Senators who favor this repeal who, while believing that we have the right to make the exemption, believe and contend the act of 1912 ought to be repealed for economic reasons; that it ought to be repealed upon grounds of sound public policy, and for that reason they favor its repeal.

Those who believe that we have not the right to make this discriminatory exemption, and who put their attitude upon that ground independently of the question whether it is good policy or bad policy, of course, do not regard this amendment as necessary. They would not desire it; they would think it would be innocuous. But that class of Senators who believe that this exemption is unwise as a matter of economic policy, who believe that it is unwise as a matter of national policy, and who, at the same time think we have the right, if we see fit, under the treaty to make the exemption, naturally desire that whatever right the United States may have shall be reserved, and that that shall be done contemporaneously with the repeal of the exemption in the act of 1912. I concede that the gentlemen who are supporting this repeal upon that idea, and upon that idea alone, have a right to ask the Senate to make that reservation, and in deference to their views about this matter I have offered the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me one moment. I wish to ask the Senator before he resumes his seat——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I should have said, of course, there are some who believe that the United States have no right to make the exemption and who oppose the exemption upon that ground, who are also opposed to it upon economic grounds, and there are others who believe, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] believes, that we have a right to make the exemption but that it is unwise as a matter of economic policy to exercise it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to suggest to the Senator that his amendment would be relieved of some ambiguity if, in the eleventh line, the word "treaties" was substituted for the word "treaty."

Mr. SIMMONS. That ought to be done. That is a purely typographical error. I was going to ask that the word "treaty" be changed to "treaties"; it is a mistake.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am under obligations to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] for making so plain his position. As I understand the Senator's position, it is that the United States has no right to exempt its vessels from tolls passing through the canal; that it is a plain violation of the treaty to do so; but that he offers an amendment providing that in case we have any right it shall be reserved. That is a somewhat singular not to say a surprising position. To reserve a right which plainly, according to the Senator, does not exist seems quite an unnecessary and probably a useless thing to do.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, in order to make my position plain and that he may not misrepresent me, I take the position that we have no right, but I also stand with the others who believe that it is unwise public policy to exempt, and I so stated.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that there are those who would retain our rights under the treaty and who believe that we have the right under the treaty to pass our vessels through the canal free, and I understand perfectly why they desire an amendment which would reserve our rights under the treaty and at the same time would like to vote for repeal upon the ground of the domestic proposition. I understand perfectly why one desiring to retain the rights under the treaty should want an amendment if at the same time he believed it unwise to have free tolls as a matter of domestic policy, and a Senator's vote upon an effective amendment holding those views would not be difficult for me to understand at all.

But I do not understand, Mr. President, how one who believes that the act of 1912 was in plain violation of the treaty and at the same time believes the act unwise also as a domestic matter could possibly vote for anything which is a compromise of his position. If it is a violation of the treaty, if the act of 1912, as said by the President, is in plain violation of our obligations with another nation, there is only one thing one having a true sense of obligation can do, and that is to vote to repeal the act without the attempt to reserve something which he denies has any existence at all. The effort to reserve something which if reserved would be dishonorable is not a high-minded thing to do.

But even as to those Senators who believe that we have a right under the treaty to pass our ships of commerce through the canal free and at the same time desire not to do it on account of the economic question, I still think that this amendment does not deal with the question candidly and fairly and courageously. Let us read the amendment—

That the passage of this act——

Mr. SIMMONS. Would it interrupt the Senator, before he enters upon that second proposition, to permit me to answer a thought that he has just developed which was not contained in his original statement and inquiry?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says he can not see how those who believe that we have not the right under the treaty could vote for this amendment of reservation. In reply to that, I want to say to the Senator while I believe that, I am not so absolutely sure of my opinion, I do not regard myself as so absolutely infallible, as to feel that because I entertain that opinion the question is, therefore, absolutely foreclosed; and I take it that is the view of other Senators.

Mr. BORAH. It must be a surrender of his own conscience and a compromise with his solemn judgment.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a matter of opinion. Those of us who believe, like I do, that we have not the right are perfectly willing that that question shall be reserved, because we recognize the fact that we may be mistaken about this matter. We are willing that it shall be reserved for diplomacy or for arbitration or for settlement in such other way as is usual and proper in the settlement of like questions in dispute between friendly nations.

Mr. BORAH. Then, if I understand the Senator correctly in his second enunciation of principle, it is that this matter is not to be settled by this repeal; that the question whether or not we have a right to exempt our vessels of commerce from tolls shall yet be open and unsettled; that there may be another tribunal which can arrive at a final conclusion, which the Senate seems unable to reach; that there may be other judges and another tribunal which can make a final determination in regard to this question.

Mr. President, as I said before, I perfectly understand the position of those Senators who divide this proposition into an economic question and into a legal question under the treaty, believing we ought not to do it as a matter of economics, and believing that we should retain our rights under the treaty; but I do not understand how, having arrived at a conclusion that it is a plain violation of the treaty, and at the same time believing it unwise as a domestic proposition, anyone can vote to reserve anything in the nature of that which he insists does not exist. It is not legislating upon a plane commensurate with the great subject before us.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to ask the Senator if he does not know the fact that President Taft, after having stated that he thought it was not a violation of the treaty, immediately afterwards said that he was willing to arbitrate that question.

Mr. BORAH. That would not change the situation. But the ex-President insisted that we had a right to exempt our ships, but was willing to arbitrate it; he did not say we have no right, but, nevertheless, we will arbitrate something we do not claim.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon one other question? Does the Senator know that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who has taken, probably, stronger grounds than anybody else against the right of the United States, has always insisted that, notwithstanding his views about it, the other party to the contract has rights, as well as ourselves, with reference to the construction of the treaty, and that these doubts, these differences of opinion, raise a proper question for arbitration?

Mr. BORAH. I understand that to be true of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. There is a vast difference between the attitude of a man who claims something and is willing to submit that to arbitration, as in the case of President Taft, and a man who claims nothing and still reserves the right to claim the thing which he admits he does not claim. There is a difference between the attitude of the two.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to address myself for a moment, and for a moment only, to the question of the language of this amendment. In this amendment, as I see it, there are two separate and distinct propositions upon which we are to vote:

That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain,

Now, I call the attention of the Senators who assume that they are reserving the right of the United States if that kind of an amendment is adopted, in the face of the statement and following the statement of the President and of Members of the Senate, to the fact that we have no such right; we say that we do not claim any such right; the Chief Magistrate has said it is in violation of the treaty; and yet they ask those who believe that we have such a right, and it is of vital and of supreme importance to this country, to vote for an amendment which does nothing more than say that we retain it if we have it. What we ought to have is a plain, distinct assertion that we have a right to pass the vessels of commerce through the canal free and enable those who believe that to vote for it in the integrity of the language which would undoubtedly reserve that right.

Let me call the attention of the Senators to the President's message. He says:

> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

The President takes the position that it is not only wrong as an economic policy, but that it is in plain violation of the treaty. Furthermore, he says:

> We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do—a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood.

Are you withdrawing from that position? You are not clearing the way for the President. You write into this act of repeal a notice to all the nations of the earth that, notwithstanding the request and plain entreaty of the President, the Congress of the United States believes that we have a right and are not willing to give it up. If you do not say that, then you, upon the other hand, are practicing a duplicity and deception with reference to this matter. You do not do what you are about to do in a plain, open, candid way. You leave the President in a most unfortunate position in view of his langauge; either that, or you are misleading the people of this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon an interruption——

Mr. BORAH. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that the Senator would have a much clearer apprehension of the position of the President of the United States if he would once come clearly to the position that Woodrow Wilson, the present incumbent of that high office, does not think that he is the United States, and that there are two parties to this contract, or three, rather—one, the Republic of Panama; one, the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; and one, the Republic of the United States. The President may very well say that I, Woodrow Wilson, think thus, but I am not the high contracting party; these United States of America constitute the high contracting party; and there are many of them who think otherwise, and it is my duty to give them a day in court. Therefore we might very properly be in favor of this legislation and at the same time be in favor of submitting this question to an international tribunal of arbitration.

The Senator all along is mixing two things that are not identifiable at all. In the first place, the President of the United States with the United States; in the second place, the Congress of the United States with the United States. They constitute the Government of the United States between them, but they do not constitute the United States, and they are mere temporary incumbents of office. Therefore, if there be a shadow of right of the United States, it ought not to be surrendered permanently and ultimately, but a day in court ought to be kept for the assertion of such rights as she may have.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, far be it from me to suggest that the President of the United States entertains the view that he is the United States or the Congress. No such thought as that, I trust, has escaped me. If I said anything to that effect, I should want to modify it at once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But does not the Senator admit that the right of arbitration, if it exists for anybody, exists for the entire people, and that where any of the people claim to get any right under the treaty to exempt these vessels, that right ought to be submitted to international arbitrament; and that it is perfectly proper while doing that temporarily to waive, pendente lite—to use a law phrase—the assertion upon the side of either of the high contracting parties?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the best answer to the argument of the Senator from Mississippi is found in the language of the President himself. The President says:

> The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do—a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood.

To whom was the President speaking? To an arbitral tribunal, to some one else who would finally pass upon it, or to the Congress of the United States? His language is unmistakable. Therefore, why this modification? Has the rising tide of public opinion reached the Senate Chamber?

Whose view did this bill, as it came over from the other House, embody with its plain, unmistakable, unquestionable assertion of repeal? The President of the United States asked the Congress without equivocation, without the use of subterfuge or insincerity, or duplicity in language, to repeal this law; and I will venture to say that no man on the other side of the Chamber will dare to rise and say that this amendment meets with the approval of the President of the United States. His party is asking him to do that before the nations of the earth which will compromise either his intellectual integrity or his courage. I think we owe it to the situation and to the subject to speak in unmistakable manly language.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, right in that line I call the Senator's attention to the last paragraph of the President's message——

Mr. BORAH. I was just going to read it.

Mr. CLAPP. Which absolutely eliminates the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. BORAH. It reads:

> We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong.

Why reserve for arbitration when the proposition is to yield. Why do you want this reservation when the proposition of the President is to yield our position, right or wrong. If you are opposed to yielding, then say so in plain language, but if you believe it is plain violation of the treaty in the name of open candid action relative to a great question, say so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi. The President continues:

> And so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

Put this amendment down beside the President's assertion that we should do this without quibble, without hesitation, without circumvention, without going around Robin Hood's barn to accomplish it, and you have the President's condemnation of this amendment and not mine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am not defending this amendment, but I am trying to defend the position of the President, and to show that there is no contradiction in it. The Senator from Idaho has read the language of the President, and unconsciously he puts a wrong interpretation upon it. The President says that we "ought to reverse our action" "without raising the question whether we were right or wrong." To what did he refer? Our action in passing the bill and thereby becoming the judges in our own case, without submitting it to an international tribunal. The reversion of action to which the President referred, as every Senator knows, was merely a repeal of this clause, because in passing that provision we had made ourselves the judge in our own case, and the President uses the language; therefore, "without raising the question" of whether our original action "was right or wrong," let us reverse it, because we ought not to be the judge in our own case. That is what I understand the President means.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the President of the United States had meant that, adept as he is and accomplished as he is in the use of expression, he would have undoubtedly conveyed it to the Congress of the United States. The President conveyed no such idea to the Congress of the United States. The President says this is a plain violation of the treaty. He does not say that the treaty is questioned or that our right under it is questioned, and, therefore, we should put ourselves in the position which we occupied before passing the bill; he does not say that we should place ourselves in a position where we may arbitrate it before a tribunal and not pass upon our own rights, but he says this is a plain violation of the treaty and we should repeal that act because it is a plain violation of the treaty, and that we should do so without quibble or without equivocation, right or wrong.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, it seems to me that what he forgets is that what the President must have meant, and all that he could have meant, is this: "This is, in my opinion, a plain violation of the treaty, but as there are many of you in whose opinions it is not a plain violation of the treaty, let us not raise the question of our right or wrong in the matter, but let us reverse that original action," which was the legislation we are now about to repeal. Then, of course, under our treaties with Great Britain and all other countries, leaving "questions of the interpretation of treaties" to arbitration, the right can be internationally determined—this is his plain further meaning. Of course the President did not mention everything in the world in connection with this question, but he expressed his opinion—not the opinion of the United States, nor would he have arrogated to himself the right to express the opinion of the United States. So when he said "This is a plain violation of the treaty," he meant, "My opinion is that it is a plain violation of the treaty." When he added, "Let us reverse our action without raising the question of right or wrong," it is as much as if he had said in so many words, "But I know that there are many of you who do not agree with me about that, and therefore let us not raise that question; let us simply reverse our action; put an end to all claim that we do not keep faith."

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, we will see from a further reading of the President's message. He says:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

The "ungrudging measure" is that we are about to put into the repeal law an amendment which, in the language of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], reserves this right for future determination. The Senator from North Carolina proposes to reserve this treaty and our rights under it for future determination. I understand perfectly the great capacity of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to deal with these questions in a way to protect the situation, whatever that situation may be, and his great power in dialectics; but does the Senator from Mississippi really believe that we are giving to the President, in order that he may deal with this foreign situation in ungrudging manner, his request when we place a restraint upon it and reserve it as a matter for future determination? Is it settled finally? If so, then this bill is certainly a misleading proposition. If it means anything at all, it means that it is yet to be determined and yet to be adjusted. The President, in my judgment, condemns the very thing which we are now about to do.

Mr. President, I did not intend to detain the Senate so long, but I want to say in all sincerity that in my judgment we are doing the wrong thing by sidestepping on this great proposition. We are not dealing with a domestic matter; it is not a matter about which our people alone are concerned; the action of the Senate of the United States to-day will be looked upon and observed by all the nations of the earth. Our action will be criticized or upheld in the four corners of the earth wherever commerce prevails or wherever a people could have any possible interest in the commerce upon this side of the globe.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. Mr. President, they will not condemn or uphold so much upon what we do as the decided, unmistakable, manly, and courageous way in which we do it. We are placing the President, who is the representative of this Government among the nations of the earth, in a position where he can not defend his intellectual integrity if he ever signs this bill. There is only one thing to do. If we have violated the treaty and any man upon the Senate floor believes that we have violated the treaty, he can not compromise with his conscience for a moment and place his country in a compromising position. If we believe, on the other hand, that we have not violated the treaty, then we should protect the rights of our Government without hesitation and in an unequivocal way. If we have violated it, you should yield without hesitation and let the chips fall where they will; do your duty by casting your vote on that line.

The Senator from Mississippi has said that we are here temporarily; true enough; that we are not the United States; true enough; but we propose, nevertheless, to take the bit in our teeth and go ahead and do this thing without having submitted it to the people of the United States. We propose to cut off from discussion before that body, which really constitutes the United States, this important question. We therefore are under every obligation to deal with this question sincerely and candidly, and those who believe that we have violated the treaty must cast their votes accordingly, it seems to me. Those who believe we have not, must vote against repeal and take the responsibility.

So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to vote upon the proposition that our rights under the treaty are plain and unmistakable; that the Panama Canal was built as our property, to be used for our advantage in the commerce of the world as against the whole world, and to take the responsibility for such a position.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. CLAPP addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. CLAPP. I also thought the Senator was through.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to yield to the Senator from Colorado before I sat down. I understood he desired to ask me a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I rose because of a remark of the Senator's at the time I sought to interrupt him, from which I inferred that we would, in his opinion, reach a vote to-day.

Mr. BORAH. Possibly.

Mr. THOMAS. That is the most gratifying information I have had upon this subject for six weeks.

Mr. BORAH. I trust the Senator from Colorado will not leave the city.

Mr. THOMAS. He will not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I confess that I am at a loss to understand the difficulty that seems to lie in the mind of the Senator from Idaho. If I believed that the provision of the Panama Canal act which exempted our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls, and thereby discriminated against other ships, were a violation of the treaty—I do not believe that it is, but if I did believe it—I could find no sort of trouble at all in saying, "Why, JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, you are not the only man in the United States; there are other men with as much brains as you; there are other men as good lawyers as you; there are other men who have made as much of a study of the Constitution and of international law as you have; do not make of yourself the superb spectacle not only of national but of international egotism, of regarding a matter of interpretation as settled because that is your opinion." "I am of the opinion," I would say in a case like that—putting myself in the other man's place—"that this is a violation of the treaty, but the distinguished junior Senator from New York is not of that opinion; the distinguished Senators from North Carolina are not; the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin is not; the distinguished Senator from Idaho is not; the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is not," and so I might run through the list; and I can not see how in common modesty, much less common sense, I can take the position that because I had come to the conclusion that our conduct was a violation of the treaty, therefore that violation was a settled fact, and that the American people had no right to a day in court for the settlement of any rights which a lot of good lawyers, good constitutionalists, good patriots, and smart men say they had a right to under the treaties. I would consider myself a poor citizen, I would consider myself unpatriotic, if I were not willing to go further, after expressing my opinion, and thus going further, say the whole people of the United States are the American party to this contract; God knows if they have rights I do not want by my conduct to make them forego the proper assertion of them, although I am a Senator or a President.

Now, what is the proper assertion of them? Not only Taft, but Roosevelt, too, came out and said that while they did not believe we had violated the treaty, they were yet in favor of leaving this matter to the definitive and ultimate settlement of an international tribunal. What do men who say that mean? They simply mean on the side against repeal, as the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] means on his side, and as the President of the United States means on his, that, "while that is my opinion, I want the interpretation of our respective rights definitively settled by a tribunal greater than I or you or any of us, and which shall be authoritative between the nations of the earth."

I am not in favor of this amendment as it stands here; but I am not opposed to it upon the ground that the Senator from Idaho is opposed to it. I think to say that "nothing in this act shall be construed as surrendering any right which we may have under these treaties" would be a fair, reasonable, and proper thing to do, but I find that it goes further than that and says:

> Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified the 21st of February, 1902, or the treaty with the Republic of Panama, ratified February 26, 1904, or otherwise—> to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal.

"Or otherwise"—

There is no "otherwise" about it. Whatever rights we have in regard to the Panama Canal are treaty rights——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have rights growing out of the treaty with Panama, as her grantee under certain conditions; we have rights growing out of a treaty with Great Britain, which treaty was repeated in the Panama treaty, but there are no inherent "otherwise" rights there. We have under those treaties the right of absolute sovereignty, the right to fortify, the right to defend, the right to control and manage under such rules as we ourselves may make, subject to the one plain condition, namely, that we shall treat the commerce of the world passing through the canal equally. In my opinion that rule of equality does not refer to the coastwise vessels, but in the opinion of some people it does. It is disputed, is here and now disputed; let it be determined, arbitrated.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word, and then I will yield to the Senator. I find further on, after the amendment says "under such treaties or otherwise," this language:

With respect to the sovereignty over—

Our sovereignty over the strip—the land and the people of the strip—is absolutely unimpeached and unquestioned by anybody. It is only in our management and operation and control of the canal and as to the sole condition that we shall manage, operate, and control it with equality for all and without discrimination against it. In this one particular only is our activity in the slightest degree limited. I am not willing to say that there is any question of sovereignty necessary to be reserved at all. Nobody is disputing it. With the exception of Colon and Panama, we own the canal strip just as we own Porto Rico, and have the same rights. It is only with regard to the operation and management of the canal itself that the rule of equality is invoked as a condition precedent to the grant. Great Britain has come into the forum and said, "I protest that you have violated the rule of equality. You admit the existence of the rule, but you say you have not violated it, because coastwise ships do not fall within the intendment of the act." Then we went on and passed an act in which we make ourselves the sole judges in our own case, asserting by legislation our own interpretation, and, without considering Great Britain at all or the other nations of the world at all, though these last receive the benefit of this treaty provision. We say that we will, anyhow, exempt these ships; none of you have anything to do with it; we do not care what rights you claim under treaty with us.

Now and then a gentleman says to me that "if you repeal this act you leave nothing to arbitrate except an abstract right." Why, my friends, if you will think for a moment, that was all that was left between us and Great Britain in Revolutionary War days. She repealed the stamp act; she repealed the duty on tea; but she asserted the right to reimpose them whenever she pleased; and we said, "You have no right to sit on the other side of the water and determine that question for yourself; we have an equal right to determine it. So long as the direct act is repealed, there is nothing but a so-called abstract right at issue between you and me; but that abstract right is the most sacred of all possible things." So we asserted upon the battle field our right of equal construction of an unwritten constitutional agreement between the various branches of the English-speaking race under which we thought that an Englishman born in America had every right that an Englishman born in Great Britain had. Now I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I was struck by the statement which the Senator made, that we had no rights in Panama except treaty rights. Does the Senator mean that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I mean that every right we have in Panama arises from a treaty; yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator take that position because we went there by virtue of a treaty with Panama?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We went there by virtue of a treaty. We had the right to go there by virtue of a treaty. We bought and paid for the land by virtue of a treaty. We acquired this strip by virtue of a treaty. We constructed the canal by virtue of a treaty, and we constructed the canal under certain preagreed conditions and limitations upon our management by virtue of treaties.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We got Louisiana by virtue of a treaty. We got California, Utah, Colorado, and New Mexico by virtue of a treaty. Does the Senator think we have no rights in California and Louisiana except treaty rights?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the Senator from Utah is too good a lawyer and too smart a man to attempt to leave either upon my mind or upon the mind of the country the impression that he thinks the two acquisitions and the purposes of the two acquisitions were in the slightest degree analogous.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. We acquired Louisiana by treaty, under an agreement that that very territory should become a part of the United States, and in the course of time should be constructed into States upon an equal footing with all the original States. It was a part of the very treaty. Had we failed to do our duty, and to grant liberty and free government to Louisiana, we would have been violating the treaty. In that case and in the case of California and in the other cases to which the Senator refers, the thing that we acquired by treaty was the right to rule and govern and absorb into ourselves as parts of ourselves the land and the people.

The thing that we acquired the right to do by treaty in Panama was to construct a canal to be operated under certain conditions; and with it, in order to facilitate our operations, there went sovereignty and right of defense and government over a certain prescribed zone. Surely the Senator does not want the country to believe that the rights under the treaty whereby we acquired Louisiana, for example, are in the slightest degree analogous with the rights which we acquired under the treaty with Panama.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, of course the treaties are different; but I do take the position that as far as Panama is concerned, the treaties may restrict the exercise of some rights which otherwise we might have. That we must look to the treaty, however, as the affirmative measure of our rights I utterly deny.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When the Senator says that under the treaty there are certain restrictions of our activities, that moment he confesses that his subsequent denial is confessed to be badly taken, because that moment he looks not only for our affirmative rights to the treaty but likewise to it for the circumscriptions and limitations and conditions assented to by us, not by any surrender of sovereignty, but by the highest exercise of sovereignty—self-limitation under contract.

When we made the treaty in regard to Louisiana we accepted no restrictions on our self-governing activities. When we acquired the territory of California we acquired it without accepting governmental or operating restrictions. When we acquired this right to build a canal in Panama we acquired it with limitations and restrictions in one sole respect, but a respect great and sacred, to wit, the management and operation of the canal in such a way as to make it an equal and undiscriminating management and operation not only as to toll charges but as to rules to be obeyed en route.

I do not care what foot of territory you ever acquire by treaty in any part of the world; you have no right in the code of morals to hold the territory under the treaty and violate the treaty. I say this, although I did not think what we did when we passed the exemption clause was a violation of the treaty, and I do not think so yet. I want merely to acknowledge the equal right of the other party to sit in judgment upon the interpretation of the treaty. I want merely to recognize the sacredness, the sanctity of our agreement, not only with Great Britain but with some 19 other nations that questions of the interpretation of treaties shall be left to international arbitral tribunals.

I will close by saying what the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] said, that we are voting to repeal this bill because we were afraid and thought we knew that you would not give us a two-thirds vote to arbitrate it; and after we repeal it we know that you will arbitrate it. You will be running over one another to arbitrate it then, because you will think that is your last chance to get something, and you will be right about it. We have felt from the beginning that it ought to be arbitrated. Roosevelt thought so, Taft thought so, the President of the United States thought so.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that in case of repeal under this particular amendment that would practically force arbitration?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that after this provision of the Panama Canal act has been repealed seven out of ten of the men who have opposed repeal will be in favor of arbitration. That is what I said.

Mr. BORAH. I see now more clearly the object and purpose of this amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the Senator does? I take no shame in the thought that I have tried as far as I could to enforce honest conduct upon the part of my own country; that I have tried to enforce upon the part of my own country a compliance with sacred treaties, the plighted faith of a Nation of freemen. If we succeed by this act, not in forcing, as the Senator calls it—I see no force in it; we are not going to make you do it vi et armis—but in persuading you to do justice to the sanctity of the plighted faith of the Republic of the West. I for one will not consider myself the subject of any just scorn or sarcasm about it. All thought or jibes of that character will pass me by without feeling of shame, and all expressions of that character will fall hurtless from the shield of a perfectly honest intent.

If I had my way, I would regard as the chief object of my political life doing my best, humble though it may be, at all times, to have my country keep its word, whatever its word may be. You forget that while it is debatable whether the act that we are repealing is in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, it is not in the slightest degree debatable that refusing to leave it to arbitration is a violation of another treaty with Great Britain and a violation of the spirit of a score of other treaties with still other countries, all of which say plainly that all questions of the interpretation of treaties not involving the honor, the vital interests, or the independence of the country, or the interest of third parties, shall be submitted to arbitration.

Why, I ask the Senator what other course could be taken? When he and I draw up a contract together, he does not sit in arbitrary judgment upon his own case and impose his own interpretation and decide the case in his own favor.

Mr. BORAH. No, Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not sit in judgment upon it and decide it in my favor. Why? Because a higher somebody than we—the Government under which we live—has said that that is a damnable principle. Our laws, our ethics, allow no man to sit in judgment upon his own case. We appoint a court which shall sit in judgment upon my and your case, and we say that in all matters not involving the defense of your life, your wife, and your children, and your home, in all cases where the law does not give you a right to kill in order to defend yourself, you shall go into court. All I am contending is that when two nations have a quarrel about a written contract they, too, shall go into court; and as there is no permanent court, that they shall make one for themselves—erect one—a court of justice and honor.

Senators need not disguise the fact, and the country will not forget it, that we have been forced to repeal this act by the necessity of defending the country's honor by securing ultimately an arbitration of the question at dispute.

Mr. BORAH. I understand perfectly how the Senator can take the position that he does, believing that the act is a violation of the treaty, but a Senator who entertains the view that it is not a violation of the treaty should not be impeached for want of a sense of national honor for saying there is nothing to arbitrate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My Heavens——

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator can not understand——

Mr. BORAH. Wait just a moment, and perhaps I shall not be so obscure as the Senator now seems, from his facial expression, to think. I object also to conceding that we are wrong, conceding that we have violated the treaty, and then going into a tribunal to arbitrate the matter thereafter.

The Senator quoted Col. Roosevelt a few moments ago upon this proposition, and I requote him to the Senator—that while he is in favor of arbitration, he is not in favor of conceding the case before we go to the arbitral tribunal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator says he can not understand how a man who does not think the exemption from tolls provision of the Panama Canal act is a violation of the treaty can be willing to submit the question to arbitration. Now, I can not understand how the Senator can not understand. [Laughter.] It seems to me so plain, in friendly and neighborly feeling between gentlemen as well as nations, that when I differ with other people about an interpretation, and they are countrymen of mine, and high officers and men of great intellect in my country, and they say to me: "I think you are wrong; I think the other party to the controversy has rights; and whether she has rights or not, she at least has clearly this right, to wit, a right to a fair trial of the question at issue." I can not understand how anybody can not understand that, nor why, therefore, I should not say: "Notwithstanding my opinion, I believe that the other party to the controversy—my own country on one side and she upon the other—have at least one right, and that is the right to a day in court and a fair trial and a fair hearing of the question of difference by a court of competent jurisdiction—an international court."

I would be in favor of that course if we had had no treaty with Great Britain upon arbitration, but there is our plighted word besides.

I repeat that if I am charged with casting this vote because I want to force the arbitration of this question of the respective rights of the two countries under the treaty, I shall take no shame to myself from the impeachment, but shall, upon the contrary, admit it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to state briefly the principles which will control my vote upon the bill repealing the toll-exemption clause and the pending amendments.

We are the owners of the Panama Canal. We exercise sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone. We have expended there $400,000,000 in the construction of a great waterway. The tonnage borne upon this canal will be of two classes, international and domestic, the latter of which, under our navigation laws, can be transported by ships of United States registry only.

Tolls have been imposed upon the international tonnage passing through this canal, including that of the United States, the purpose of which is to reimburse the United States for a portion of its interest charge and upkeep. No tolls are imposed upon the domestic tonnage, called the coastwise tonnage; and the first question is whether, as a matter of domestic policy, so far as domestic tonnage is concerned, without reference to the treaty, which will be considered later, the charges for the construction and upkeep of this canal shall continue to stand against the Federal Treasury or shall be imposed upon such domestic tonnage. This involves an historical inquiry regarding the waterway development of the United States.

I will not be tedious in recounting the history of this country as to waterway development. It is analogous to that of the roads of the country. In the early history of the country our roads were toll roads and our artificialized waterways were toll waterways. But gradually the policy of internal improvement was developed. The last vestige of toll roads has been swept away, and the last vestige almost of canal tolls has been swept away. We find that to-day one of the toll canals in private ownership is about to be purchased by the United States for the sum of $3,000,000, with a view to relieving the commerce between Philadelphia and Baltimore of the burden imposed by these tolls, and hereafter this connecting link between Delaware Bay and Chesapeake Bay, long managed as a tolls canal, is to be a free canal.

We have built the Soo Canal; we have artificialized the entire Ohio River, a work not yet completed, involving the expenditure of $65,000,000. That entire river is to be artificialized and made practically, by locks and dams, a series of canals.

Does the Senator from Kentucky insist that the traffic borne on the Ohio River thus artificialized shall pay tolls to the United States Government for the expenditures made upon it? No; he joins with all the people of the United States in declaring that the waterways of the country should be improved and developed and artificialized at the expense of the National Government, and that no charge whatever should be imposed upon the tonnage borne upon these waterways.

All three parties during the last campaign and the campaign of four years previous focused their platforms largely upon the demand for waterway development, the Democratic Party committing itself in the most emphatic way by declaring that a full and comprehensive plan should be adopted for the development of our waterways, involving the cooperation of all the scientific and engineering services of the Government that had anything to do with water, involving the cooperation of the Nation with the States, involving the related questions of the conservation of water for irrigation, water-power development and its control, for swamp-land reclamation, declaring for an ample fund to be expended under the direction of a board of experts authorized by law. That demand was repeated in the platform of 1912, and under this great system the entire charge for construction and development and maintenance was to be imposed upon the Federal Treasury and not upon the tonnage transported.

We went beyond that in the last national platform and declared that the problem of the Mississippi was a national problem, practically relieving the adjoining States from responsibility for the construction and maintenance of an extensive protective system such as levees, and imposing the entire expenditure for the improvement and development of that river upon the National Treasury.

Was there any suggestion that the tonnage between St. Louis and New Orleans should pay anything either on account of construction or maintenance? Oh, no. This was a policy of national development, of internal development, requiring the improvement of our waterways as national agencies of transportation, at the cost of the Treasury, and their complete development, so that the waterways would be as perfect as the railways themselves, with terminal facilities, transfer facilities, and facilities for coordination with rail, our waterways thus dovetailing with our railways and both dovetailing with the ocean transportation which it is to be hoped will yet be established under the American flag.

Mr. President, I assume it will be admitted that the Pacific coast is a part of the Union, that the Pacific Coast States are States of the Union, that the cities of San Francisco and New Orleans have the same right to have their traffic from port to port go through any waterway of the United States free of charge as the people of Baltimore and Philadelphia have a right to have it transported through the Delaware Canal, which brings the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays into conjunction as a connected waterway of the country.

It seems to me, therefore, that no difference of opinion can arise upon the question as to whether that should be imposed as a charge upon the National Treasury or a charge upon the tonnage transported. The people of the Pacific and the Gulf coasts have the same right to have tonnage transported between those coasts free from any charge for waterway improvement that the people of Philadelphia and Baltimore have, or the people of Boston and of Beaufort, S. C., have, connected, as they will be some day, by an inland waterway embracing the Cape Cod Canal, Long Island Sound, Delaware River, Delaware Bay, Chesapeake Bay, and Pamlico Sound, without any charge whatever so far as the Government itself is concerned. I have not the slightest doubt that within a reasonable time the Cape Cod Canal itself will be acquired by the Government, and for the express purpose of relieving the tonnage of a tax imposed upon it by private interests.

Mr. President, these pledges with reference to the waterways of the country are specific. They were contained in the platforms of 1908 and of 1912. They are just as explicit as the platform pledge regarding subsidy. They are just as explicit as the platform pledge regarding the exemption of domestic vessels from Panama tolls. All these are pledges given by the Democratic Party to the American people. Then will it be contended for a moment that this waterway improvement constitutes a subsidy; that the great waterway development called for by our platform involves a subsidy to private interests forbidden by another plank?

The platform itself interprets the term "subsidy." It absolutely excludes its application to any exemption from charge for either construction or maintenance of the waterways of the country. It clearly recognizes the right and the wise policy of the American Government to improve its waterways and impose the entire charge of construction and of upkeep upon the Federal Treasury.

Mr. President, we now come to the treaty. We are told that we can not pursue this domestic policy which has been built up in a hundred years with reference to domestic vessels of American registry engaged in a business in which no foreign interest can engage, because we entered into a treaty with Great Britain regarding the construction of the Panama Canal, an enterprise in which Great Britain did not put up a dollar, the only basis of her recognition being a treaty, the Bulwer-Clayton treaty, a worn-out treaty which it would have been our right at any time to have condemned under the law of nations.

I do not propose, so far as I am concerned, to enter into the reason of the question as to whether the Panama Canal treaty obligates us to give to England the same treatment that we give to our domestic vessels under a purely domestic policy. I do not propose to repeat the argument which I made two years ago in reply to the Senator from New York upon this subject. I stand upon the argument that I made then. I do not believe that that treaty has any relation whatever to our purely domestic policy, to the regulations of our domestic sovereignty with reference to matters entirely under our jurisdiction and control; and, believing that, I maintain we have a right to declare that we should continue to pursue the traditional American policy with reference to a domestic waterway constructed by American money in its relation to purely domestic ships engaged in purely domestic trade.

But the President of the United States is of a different view. He believes that that treaty controls our domestic policy; that under that treaty we have put ourselves in a strait-jacket with reference to our domestic tonnage, and that honor and good faith demand that we should repeal the exemption; and he asks us to repeal it.

Numerous amendments have been proposed providing different methods of disposing of this great question. Among these amendments, unless we stand firmly by the repeal, the best, it seems to me, is that suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], which provides for a suspension of this exemption for the period of two years and for a diplomatic negotiation, not an arbitration, with England, with a view to adjusting this difficulty. I think that is an eminently practical way of reaching this question.

The country is divided in opinion regarding the construction of this treaty. Statesmen are divided in opinion. Lawyers are divided in opinion. Many men of distinction in England believe that the construction which we have given to this treaty is right. Mr. Innes, the diplomatic representative of England, in one of his letters declared that this question of the coastwise traffic involved a question of serious doubt, and indicated that it might lawfully be withdrawn from the operation of the treaty if the withdrawal should be applied to coastwise traffic alone. So in the diplomatic correspondence we find a doubt expressed by England herself as to the correctness of this contention regarding the coastwise traffic in domestic ships. Yet thus far there has been no parley, no diplomatic negotiation, regarding the matter. Why should we proceed to arbitration now when diplomatic negotiation conducted by diplomatic representatives of both nations may bring about an amicable adjustment of this matter?

For my part, I have always thought if we had declared in the tolls act that our purpose in exempting American ships was not to impose an additional burden upon international tonnage, but to make the cost chargeable to domestic tonnage a charge against the Treasury of the United States, England would not have taken the position which she did. In a speech which I made two years ago I insisted upon it that we shou'd by amendment insert in the act a declaration of our purpose, our honorable purpose, not to impose upon foreign countries the burden from which we relieve our domestic vessels, but simply to frankly impose that charge against the Treasury of the United States pursuant to the fixed and traditional policy of the United States with reference to our domestic waterways.

I believe this matter could be settled by diplomatic negotiation, and I see no reason why we shou'd absolutely surrender our contention when possibly by diplomatic negotiation the matter can be adjusted to the mutual satisfaction of England and the United States. There is such a thing as an unconscionable contract from which diplomacy as well as equity may relieve. And if this treaty really means what the supporters of this repeal declare it means, then it is a hard bargain, an unconscionable agreement, from which the honest purpose of England will doubtless relieve us, if assurance is given that the burthen from which our domestic ships are relieved will not be transferred to the ships of other nations.

A suggestion which strikes me favorably is the suggestion of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that we should provide a method by which a suit, which will finally find its way to the Supreme Court of the United States by some expedited process, can determine whether this exemption is in derogation of the treaty. The Supreme Court is called upon to interpret our Constitution; it is called upon to determine whether our laws infringe upon that Constitution; it is called upon frequently to determine the question of treaty rights. Why should not this question of domestic legislation be submitted by some quick process to that tribunal for determination before we surrender for all time our right to legislate upon one of the most important of our domestic affairs?

Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to this debate. I recognize, of course, the high purpose of the President, his conscientiousness and courage in recommending legislation in direct contradiction of our platform. Believing, as he doubtless does, that the legislation of 1912 is an infringement of the treaty, and realizing, as he does, that a treaty is the supreme law of the land, he is right, from that standpoint, in advising that the supreme law of the land should stand above a mere party platform. I have no criticism to make of him regarding his action, but I have no similar appreciation of or praise for those men who, believing to the contrary, will vote for this bill simply with a view to supporting an administration measure.

I propose to stand by my original vote because I am unconvinced, because I believe that as a matter of public policy the waterways of the country should be a charge upon the National Treasury and not upon the tonnage transported upon them, and because I believe that the treaty, whilst requiring equality of treatment with reference to international tonnage, has no application whatever to purely domestic tonnage carried upon domestic ships and between domestic ports.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Mr. President, I desire to make a short statement giving the reasons for the vote which I intend to cast.

The discussion of the repeal of the act granting exemption from tolls of American coastwise shipping has passed beyond the limits of a debate. It is now a yawning invitation to all Senators to indulge in monologues, and one which will apparently not be withdrawn until accepted by all the Members of this body.

Therefore, for the purpose of conserving time, I accept the invitation and will state briefly the reasons which control my vote upon this question.

It is customary at the threshold of a discussion of this question to analyze the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, to split hairs, to define the ordinary meaning of commonplace words, and to end by construing the exemption as being permitted or prohibited by the treaty, according to the conviction of the speaker.

I am not going to discuss this phase of the question, for even if it were conceded that the exemption from tolls of our coastwise shipping did not violate the treaty I should, nevertheless, vote to repeal that provision of the act of 1912.

If the view be sound—that the treaty is not violated by the exemption—then those Senators adhering to this view should be the last to urge that by the repeal of this provision we are surrendering any part of our complete and absolute sovereignty of the Canal Zone or recognizing any right of Great Britain, or any other nation on earth, to interfere with our management or control of the canal.

Under their view it is immaterial whether we merely pass the repealing act as it came from the House of Representatives or ornament it with amendments containing trite truisms which can neither add to nor subtract from the obligations of the treaty, for in repealing the exemption, which according to their view is not affected by the treaty, we are not surrendering sovereignty or truckling to England or waiving our rights to fortify the canal and use it in times of war to the best advantage of American arms. By statute Congress can not add or subtract one iota to or from the obligation of a treaty.

Irrespective of what our relations with England may have been or are—whether we are next of kin, drawn together by ties of blood, or foes suspicious of each other—neither view should blind our eyes or warp our judgment in considering the great economic question involved in exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls.

But, before answering, or even considering this question, those of us on this side of the Chamber must answer another question, whether as Democrats we are free to consider and determine the economic soundness of the tolls exemption, or are we bound by our party platform, promulgated at Baltimore in 1912, to vote against repealing this act.

Under the head of "Merchant marine," there was inserted in that platform the following plank:

> We favor the exemption from toll of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the canal.

If that was the only provision contained in the party pronouncement, then whatever might be my convictions as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the exemption from tolls I would feel bound to vote against the repeal.

The same section, however, provides:

> We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine, which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

Despite the severe characterization of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] of those who insist that these two planks in the platform are contradictory, I can not but believe that only one of them can stand as the view of the Democratic Party.

The plank last quoted directly prohibits the granting of bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

Is the exemption from tolls to the coastwise vessels a bounty or subsidy?

The canal is owned by the United States. The tolls collected will be covered into the Treasury. If the act of August 24, 1912, instead of granting the exemption, had provided that out of moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $1.25 per ton should be paid to the American coastwise vessels that went through the canal no one could question but that such an act granted a direct subsidy, and yet the exemption from tolls grants to the vessels so exempted an uncollected bounty of $1.25 per ton and deprives the United States Treasury of an equal amount per ton, and the only difference in this case between the exemption and the subsidy is a matter of bookkeeping, the largess or bounty of $1.25 per ton being granted by statute instead of being collected, covered into the Treasury, and repaid.

The exemption being a subsidy, the question, therefore, is, Which of the two planks, inconsistent with and contradictory of each other, must perish and which survive?

To determine this we must look to the history of the party. The Democratic Party has always been a friend of the merchant marine, and has believed that it should be built up, not by subsidy and the granting of privilege to a favored few, but by the repeal of the laws and a cessation of the policy that destroyed it, so it may be built on a foundation which will be both sound and lasting.

In the platform of 1904 we find the special denunciation of ship subsidy under the heading "Merchant marine," as follows:

> We denounce the ship subsidy bill recently passed by the United States Senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes and a wasteful, illogical, and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstructions raised by Republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the sea.
> We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

Again, in the platform adopted at Denver in 1908 we find another prohibition against the building up of our merchant marine by bounty:

> We believe in the upbuilding of the American merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the Public Treasury.

Such is in line with the settled policy and established traditions of the Democratic Party, for in the platform adopted at Baltimore in 1872 we find a specific plank against giving grants or bounties to railroads and other corporations.

If we are to regard the plank in the Baltimore platform declaring in favor of the tolls exemption of coastwise vessels as destructive of, as repealing, or rendering ineffective the other plank against granting subsidies and bounties from the Treasury to our merchant marine, of which the coastwise vessels are a part, then we must overthrow the established policy of the Democratic Party throughout its long and useful life and no longer inveigh against the granting of special privilege to a favored few.

With the history of the party before us, its traditions, and the opportunities it offers for equality of service to all, the conclusion is inevitable that the provision in the Baltimore platform declaring in favor of granting exemption from tolls of coastwise vessels is rendered nugatory and without meaning by the other provision declaring against the granting of subsidies to the merchant marine, which is sanctioned by the traditions and policies of the party since the days of Jackson and Jefferson.

Believing that as a Democrat I can vote in favor of the repealing act, not only without violating the Democratic platform, but that the platform requires me to vote for the repeal in order that I may carry out the provision against subsidies, I am delighted to find that the platform provision coincides with my belief in the economic unsoundness of the exemption.

The history of this country is told in the story of the struggle between privilege and democracy. Privilege knows neither section nor party. Slavery was a species of privilege granted and protected by the Constitution, a privilege which was not only inhuman but economically unsound, and the greatest curse ever visited upon the section which, within its constitutional rights, fought to disrupt the Union to the end that this privilege might be preserved.

The tariff is but another striking example of privilege, and the industry that is built to exist and prosper only when protected, is built upon a foundation of quicksand and must in the end crumble and be reduced to ashes, as was slavery.

At the inception of our life as a Nation privilege in the form of slavery was established.

At the outset of our domestic industrial life privilege in the form of a tariff became the settled policy of our country; and now, at the outset of our life as the greatest international power, we are again asked to place privilege in the saddle by granting a subsidy in the form of a toll exemption to a shipping industry that is in no need of such exemption and is powerful enough to prevent the exemption from finding its way into the pockets of the ultimate consumer.

Trade, industry, and commerce are no longer provincial or domestic, but are international.

Irrespective of which flag flies at the mast of our vessels, be they regular liners or tramps, we find, through the holding companies, trusts, and combinations, English capital promoting and owning American bottoms and American dollars building part of the English merchant marine.

A monopoly has been given by statute to the coastwise trade. This was a mistake. Shall we add to this mistake at this time by giving to that monopoly the exemption which it neither needs nor deserves?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEE of Maryland in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. REED. I am glad to hear the Senator from Tennessee admit that the coastwise trade is given a monopoly, and I want to ask him, in view of the fact that the coastwise trade is, as he says, controlled by a monopoly enjoying a special privilege, if he does not think he could afford to support the amendment which I have proposed to destroy this monopoly by opening all the ports of the United States to the vessels of all nations?

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that at another time I should be delighted to support a bill repealing the law touching the coastwise vessels which gives them a monopoly; but I would not support any amendment brought in at this time which would result, even if it were not the purpose of the amendment, in defeating what I think is absolutely a meritorious and necessary measure, namely, the repeal of the subsidy granted by the act of 1912.

Mr. REED. I beg to say to the Senator from Tennessee that I have not offered the amendment for the purpose of defeating the bill. I have offered the amendment as a means to do two things: One is to avoid the difficulties which have been raised against this bill, and the other is to avoid the exactions of this coastwise monopoly. I have not offered the amendment with any purpose such as the Senator might have meant to intimate by his remarks.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that as an independent proposition I should be glad to support it, but as an amendment to this proposed act I would not.

It is said that the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill, in which all of us on this side of the Chamber feel as much confidence and to which we point with as much pride as when it was enacted into law, contains a provision that is a subsidy. Grant it. But the bill contains so much more good that this evil did not justify any Democrat in either branch of Congress in opposing it or the President in not signing it because it contained one un-Democratic and vicious provision.

It is said that we grant a subsidy when we develop the internal waterways of this country and do not exact tolls. This is not sound nor a correct analogy to granting of exemption from tolls upon the Panama Canal.

The work upon our rivers and harbors is necessarily work of internal improvement, and all who have reason or cause to benefit by these improvements use them upon the same terms of absolute equality.

The English vessel or the Chinese bark that comes into our harbors improved by American dollars uses it upon the same terms as our domestic vessels.

The question before us is not whether there should be any tolls, whether any tolls should be imposed upon vessels using the canal, but whether we should exempt a certain class of vessels using the canal.

Personally I hope the day may come when this great country can afford to spend the nearly $30,000,000 per annum necessary for the maintenance of the canal and the investment, and charge not one cent of tolls to any vessel in the world, receiving in compensation for this great outlay a reduced price upon the commodities transported through it, a compensation to be enjoyed by all, great and small, rich and poor, monopoly and independent, which, unlike a subsidy to a class, would find its way into the pockets of the smallest of the common people; but to-day we are concerned not with this but merely with the question of whether we will grant a subsidy to our coastwise vessels.

To subsidize was once a term of opprobrium. To subsidize is defined in the Century Dictionary "to secure the cooperation of by bribing."

> Pietro could never save a dollar? Straight
> He must be subsidized at our expense.

Must we nickname our coastwise vessels Pietros?

Subsidies have fallen into such disrepute that those who favor their being paid out of the Public Treasury seek to call them by the more euphonious term of "subvention." But whether called subvention or subsidy, the principle is wrong which permits taxes to be collected from all of the people and a part of them returned to a few who are powerful and rich enough to secure by legislation this privilege.

One word more in conclusion.

It has been charged during this debate that the votes in favor of the repeal will be given by those who believe, first, that exemption violates the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; second, by those who believe that exemption is economically unsound; and, third, by those who are influenced by the Executive to adopt his view in preference to their own.

While I do not enjoy the pleasure of the most intimate association with the President, yet I feel that I know enough of his attitude upon this as well as upon all public questions to say that he would be the last man in the world to attempt to substitute his judgment or opinion for the judgment or opinion of any man, unless the reasons controlling his judgment and opinion appealed to those with whom he is associated as strongly as they do to his own mind.

It is evident to all who have even a passing acquaintance with political conditions that the President is passing, and passing triumphantly, through the crisis of his administration. The assault is most terrific at this time, because the enemies of the administration and the foes of the principles for which Woodrow Wilson stands know that if he solves successfully the problems immediately confronting his administration that not only will he justify the belief of the American electorate that placed power in his hands, but that he will hand down to posterity a record of greater achievements than have been accomplished by any other administration within the same period of time.

Whatever may be the views of individual Senators upon the phases of the problems embodied in the pending measures, if one has doubt as to his course it should be the attitude of each Senator to resolve that doubt in favor of sustaining at this time the man in the White House, whom all concede to be animated by the purest motives and the highest purposes, and who to a singular degree is the Chief Executive of all the people of this great country.

Woodrow Wilson's ambition is to contribute to the amelioration of humanity. Let us help him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I regret very much that the point of order was made this morning against the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. It looks to me as though there was some design in arranging a situation to force a vote upon a proposition framed in a particular way and to avoid a free vote upon a question differently and more vigorously stated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think I can at once relieve the Senator's mind of that impression. We who are going to vote for this substitute concede that as soon as it is substituted for the committee report, the amendment then is open to amendment, and is open to amendment in the freest and most complete way, and that it is even also open to a complete new substitute.

I took an entirely opposite view from the ruling of the Chair on yesterday morning, and I tried to sustain it, but I concluded that the authorities were against me.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I understand the situation, and I do not think it exists without design. I think I understand fully why the point of order is insisted upon. I used to know an Irish gentleman who had an expression that ran like this, "I did not come to town yesterday." The committee propose an amendment to this bill; a prominent member of the committee brought in an amendment to the amendment; the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] proposed to amend that amendment, which was the last step which could be taken under parliamentary law, but if the situation had remained in that way there would have been a vote upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska. Thereupon the Senator from Nebraska was induced to have his amendment incorporated, and it having been incorporated and withdrawn by the Senator, a parliamentary situation was created by which, under the ruling of the Chair, no further amendments could be made. I think that was pretty carefully worked out.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Senator who supported the point of order stated that during the last 24 hours he had consulted with some great authority in regard to the rules, and so forth, governing this body?

Mr. REED. The Senator might also call my attention to the fact that the whole matter was spoken of in the press of Washington, and it was stated that the Senator from Nebraska had very adroitly gained an advantage, so that he could force a vote.

I am not criticizing the Senator from Nebraska. He stated that there were certain things he wanted incorporated, and being in some doubt, I apprehend, whether his goods would get to town if he undertook to haul them in his own cart, he was willing to load them into a wagon which he thought had a better opportunity to arrive; and, therefore, I think he was very shrewd in making the move he did. But, nevertheless, I think that this situation has been created for the purpose of preventing a square vote at this time upon the broad question whether the Senate means to say to all the world that, in its opinion the United States is free to exempt its coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls and to force the question on here, and have adopted a sort of compromise in an innocuous form.

So far as I am concerned I think that the great question we are now settling is not one of subsidy; it is not one of tolls; it is not one of internal policy. The question we are settling now, and from which we can not escape, is whether the United States has any rights in the Panama Canal not possessed by every other nation on earth, except the right to pay the interest, maintain the canal, and protect it, if need be, by the blood and treasure of the country.

I want the opportunity now at this time to vote upon that question, to vote upon it squarely, frankly, manfully, and not to dodge it in any way or not to hide behind a phraseology so doubtful that it seems to me it must have originated in the brain of some diplomat who wrote the Panama Canal treaty.

I am not saying how I shall vote on this bill at this time, because I do not know the form this bill will assume before the final vote comes, but I can say to the friends of this bill that they do not incline me toward its support by denying me the opportunity to vote squarely upon the proposition whether we propose to assert our ownership, our control, and our sovereignty over this property.

Mr. President, I did not intend at this time to go into the argument of the merits of the case. I do not know that I shall at any time impose on the good nature of the Senate and upon the impatience of those who have already spoken two or three times by making any prolonged remarks. I have observed, however, I remark in passing, that the man who is perfectly satisfied in his own mind that the time has arrived for a vote, and that any delay is inimical to the welfare of the country and jeopardizes the entire course of creation, is a man who has himself made two or three speeches.

Mr. President, this question has assumed this morning a phase which, it seems to me, demands a more positive statement on the part of the Senate than was demanded by the conditions yesterday. Now, let us see what it is. We are face to face with the question whether the United States has any rights in the Panama Canal that are of any real value except the right to fortify. It is insisted that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from North Carolina preserves whatever rights we have, and that, therefore, by the repeal of the tolls clause we leave ourselves in as good a position as we were before we repealed the tolls clause.

Mr. President, if the author of that amendment had asserted upon the floor of the Senate that he believed we had the right to control this canal; that the treaty had not taken away from us that right, and he had offered the amendment to carry out that purpose, his amendment would have meant very much more, in my opinion, than it does when he says "I do not believe we have any rights; and being an advocate of the doctrine that the United States has no right, I offer this amendment." To what end or purpose does a man who believes that the United States has no rights proceed to recite that we do not hereby waive the rights which he, the author, says we do not possess?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to make an observation, and I thank the Senator from Missouri for yielding to me, as I might not have the opportunity to make it later on.

I shall, of course, vote against the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I have large respect for that eminent statesman, but have no respect for his amendment. I have never liked shams of any kind. I am just thinking in what category or what place history will write this amendment, whether it will write it down as the Simmons amendment or the Simmons apology; but it occurs to me that it will be written in history as the Simmons tango, because it is one step forward, two steps backward, and then a "side step." [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, I wonder what sort of standing we will have in an international court of arbitration, referred to by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is a very strong advocate of arbitrating all international disputes, and who is a most eloquent advocate of that doctrine—I wonder what kind of position we will occupy before that tribunal when we come in and lay down our papers in the case, and the question is raised by England, as it will be raised, "You waived your rights, you conceded the contention of England when you repealed the tolls clause"—when that transpires I wonder how the representative of the United States Government will appear when he declares, "No; we did not waive our rights; we adopted the Simmons amendment, reserving our rights," and the English statesman replies that from the record written out of the mouth of the Senator who wrote this amendment he himself declared we had no rights.

Will we not be in a wonderfully strong position before a court of arbitration under those circumstances? Why, sir, we will be like a disputant in a court over a land title, where one party sturdily insists that he is the owner of the land, and the other appears, saying, "I should like to try the question whether I am the owner of the land; and I at one time declared that I reserved my rights as owner if I had any, but in the same breath and at the same moment of time I said I knew mighty well I did not have any." How long could a litigant stand in court under those conditions and circumstances?

If this question must ever go to arbitration, I should like it to go to arbitration at least with a square declaration of right. No man ever won a lawsuit in a court of arbitration or in any other court who did not go there asserting that he had a right. No man ever gained a controversy in a court where his opponent was insisting sturdily upon a certain right, and he himself was standing in an attitude that to say the least is pusillanimous, and saying: "I do not know whether I have any rights or not, but if I have any rights then I want the court to find out whether I have them or not. I can not assert them myself."

Nobody ever won a lawsuit that way. No nation ever gained a controversy that way. I am in favor of saying here to-day that we do stand asserting a right; not that we stand here asserting that if we have something then we propose to say that we have not by this act given it away.

The unfortunate thing about the case now is that I am afraid it is ruined at this point. I am afraid enough has transpired now, so that if we ever go to any court of arbitration on earth the representatives of the people of the United States have furnished arguments that will put us out of court and insure a judgment against us.

It was well said here by the Senator from Mississippi that we are but temporary incumbents. Ah, Mr. President, I want to enforce that thought. We are but temporary incumbents. We are but trustees, holding for a time the responsible position of representing the people of the United States. I want to draw a line between our duty here as trustees and what our rights might be if we were proprietors.

There is a great difference between the right of a trustee and the right of a proprietor. A proprietor, having engaged himself in a contract with his neighbor, and finding that a dispute or difference of opinion has arisen between them, may assume the old-fashioned southern gentleman's attitude and say to his neighbor: "Well, sir, rather than have a dispute with you, I yield you the $1.000 that you claim," or, "I yield you the possession you insist you understood you were to have." Being the proprietor, the owner of the land, or the possessor of the money, he can pay a compliment to his own generosity, and he can pay a compliment in like manner to his instincts as a gentleman, by giving to his neighbor that which is his own. But, sir, if he has in his hand the property of the widow or the orphan or the friend, he can not be generous with that money. He can not give that away in compliment of his ideas as a gentleman. He can not transfer the rights of those whom he represents on any other ground or basis save that he is compelled to do it as a matter of absolute justice; and when there is a serious dispute on a question of fact he has no right to resolve it against his cestui que trust. It is his business at least to have the decision of some impartial tribunal before he yields those rights.

So, when I hear men talk about our high sense of honor, and how we should not permit a dispute to arise, urging that foreign nations have arrived at a conclusion that they have as much right in the canal as we have, and therefore, to be generous, to be good hearted, to be whole souled, we should concede the point, I remind those who think they ought to concede this point that, as was said by the Senator from Mississippi, they are here only in a transitory state. They do not own this canal. The people of the United States own this canal. Every dollar of money that has been spent, and every dollar of money that must yet be paid, is but coined sweat from the brow of the labor of the United States; and the only justification we can have for yielding this great point of dispute is to justify it by asserting that it is without question against us.

Mr. President, who can assert that it is without question against us, and do it with the modesty which ought to become a man? I may well say that, to my mind, the question is without dispute; but when I find my brother Senator, as capable, as efficient as myself—aye, more capable and efficient than myself—taking the diametrically opposite view, I can no longer assert that the question does not have two sides, and no other honest and modest man can do it. When I find that the Congress of the United States by a majority vote and after full debate inserted in the canal law this clause which has been the occasion of the present dispute; when I know that that debate went into every ramification of the question as to our rights under the treaty, and a majority of the Senate and a majority of the House after that debate determined that we did have this right, I can not say that the question does not have two sides. There must be some merit to a contention that has been supported by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress, and for which a majority of the Democrats voted, if my recollection serves me right.

Mr. CLAPP. Overwhelmingly.

Mr. REED. Overwhelmingly, the Senator says, and that is my recollection. Aye, we forced it; we fought for it; we contended for it; we overcame by our votes the tremendous influence and power of the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who contended that the treaty barred us from this privilege.

Who, then, can say that this is not a question at least of serious doubt?

I come now to the present debate. Why, here are men who have been judges of courts, here are Senators of long experience, here are men who, while we meet them as equals in this Chamber, are nevertheless regarded by the country at large as authorities upon questions of law and statesmanship, ranging themselves against the proposition that the United States has violated this treaty; and who shall say the question is beyond doubt?

Mr. President, if it is not beyond doubt, what is our duty to the 100,000,000 people who are not here in the Senate, but who have trusted their rights to us? Is it upon a doubtful proposition, upon a questionable proposition, to concede away their rights; or is it to affirm here that they have a right, and, having affirmed it, to seek by all honorable and fair means to maintain it? Certainly we can afford to go as far as is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], when he asks that we shall assert this right, and then shall appoint a commission to confer diplomatically with reference to it.

I repeat, if this case has not already been ruined, it will be if we pass a questionable resolution of reservation.

Let us examine it.

Yonder stands the representative of the great Government of England. We are going to have an arbitration now, for that is the thing that seems to be ahead of us. The representative of England, without any doubt, without any cavilling, without equivocation, without any hesitancy, comes into that tribunal and asserts that under the terms of this treaty the United States can not grant to a vessel of its citizens a single privilege that it must not grant to every other citizen and vessel of the world.

The case proceeds to trial. The representative of Great Britain will introduce the statement of the President of the United States. Exhibit A, that hearing, will be the message of the President of the United States, and the first sentence read, or at least emphasized, will be this:

> That exemption * * * is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

"But," the American representative will reply, "that was merely the statement of the President, and does not commit us." Whereupon the representative of Great Britain will say, "But the President recommended, because of this expressed view, that Congress take certain action, to wit, that it repeal the clause that had given offense; and Congress did take that action, and by so doing it approved the language of the President when he said we had violated the treaty."

"Ah," says the representative of the United States, "but while we did that we reserved our rights." "Yes," says the representative from Great Britain in reply, as he holds up the Simmons amendment, "you reserved your rights which your President said you did not possess, but you did not dare assert a right. You could not get enough votes in either branch of Congress, when you were there all alone, to assert in manly tones that you had a right."

What do you think, Senators, would be your reply if you stood there representing the United States before that board of arbitrament? I think you would do what, once or twice, I have had to do. I have had to ask the court please to permit me to retire.

Mr. CLAPP. Withdraw a juror.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Minnesota suggests that the device in his State is to withdraw a juror.

Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the main issue. I may do so before this debate is over, because it is not over yet. I say, however, that since the Senator from North Carolina has said, of and concerning his own amendment, that he does not propose to assert any right, but merely to reserve such rights as we may have; and when he has said, in addition to that, that his own opinion is that we have no rights, that we gave them away by this treaty—and, of course, the rights I am discussing are the particular rights that are now in question—since that is the case, in my opinion it becomes imperative that we shall adopt different language than that contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

I would prefer that amendment to nothing; but a parliamentary situation has been created where I must either vote for that amendment without the right to offer an amendment to it or to vote for an amendment offered by another Senator strengthening it, or I must vote seemingly to give my approval to the uncertain terms of the Simmons amendment. I am going to vote against it, because under the circumstances presented here this morning I think it is far from going to the point to which we should go, and I am going to vote against it in the expectation and hope and certainly that at the proper time I shall have an opportunity to vote for an amendment that asserts the authority of the United States to control this canal as to the domestic commerce of the United States.

Mr. President, I am going to take a moment to discuss this subsidy question. What is the use of Senators undertaking to set up straw men to hide behind? There is not a Senator in this Chamber who does not know what the Baltimore platform said and meant. We need not cavil here about phrases. We knew what we were talking about then, and we know what we are talking about now.

The Baltimore platform contained two propositions which these gentlemen say are contradictory. One was that we condemned ship subsidies; the other was that we proposed that there should be exemption from tolls to the coastwise vessels of the United States. These logicians say now that these two propositions are in conflict, and therefore they will pick the one they choose and stand on that. They forget that if there were two propositions in absolute conflict one of them would kill the other and neither of them would be of any force or validity.

If you have two propositions in absolute conflict, you can not pick the one you choose, because one of them is deadly to the other and both die from the same cause and at the same moment of time. The rule of construction that is adopted everywhere by every court of the world is that when there are two propositions of a different nature you shall, if possible, give to both of them their full meaning and effect, not using one to destroy the other, but construing both so that both shall be vitalized.

Apply that here to what we were talking about. We need not haggle about phrases. For many years the Republican Party had advanced the doctrine of going down into the Treasury of the United States and paying a subsidy in the shape of dollars and cents to certain vessels that might comply with certain rules. We condemned that in many platforms. We were talking about that thing, and only about that thing, when we said in our platform that we condemned subsidies, and we knew what we were talking about—the specific instance, the particular case, the historic topic, had been before us for years.

What was the other proposition? The other proposition was the question of tolls through the canal. We had that before us. It had been the subject of discussion and debate. We knew what we were dealing with. We proposed to say, and we did say, that our coastwise vessels should go through free.

We gain nothing by trying to deceive ourselves and saying that these two propositions being in conflict, we may therefore set aside one of them. They are not in conflict. They are no more in conflict than if we had said, "We are against subsidies"—and for the moment I am conceding this to be a subsidy, which I do not concede as a matter of fact—"we are against paying subsidies to vessels plying between the United States and England, but we are in favor of granting a remission of duties to goods shipped in American vessels plying between North and South America."

If those two propositions had been there together, they could have been construed together, and both of them could have lived, and each would have expressed the pledge it was intended to express. So when it is claimed, as it has been here by many eloquent Senators, that we are in some manner exculpated from our pledge that coastwise vessels shall not be compelled to pay tolls, I can not deceive myself by that sort of argument. I know what we meant by those words, and so do other Senators know, and so does every citizen of the United States know.

That brings us squarely to the question. Having put into our platform the statement that we believed in the exemption from tolls of coastwise vessels, we must either stand by that declaration or we must, in a manly way, say that we are going to repudiate it and give the reasons for repudiating it; but let us not hide behind the miserable pretense that there is a conflict in the two provisions in the platform, when, as a matter of fact, the platform was dealing with two diametrically different propositions.

I have no quarrel in the world with a man who has become convinced that for economic reasons we ought to charge tolls. I have no criticism to make of him. He has a right to take that view and he has a right to go back to his constituency and say, "After maturely studying this question, various considerations arose which made me believe that we ought to declare for a different policy, and I did it." But I can not, so far as I am concerned, tell my people that I did it because there was a conflict in the provisions of the platform.

That brings me to another question. Is this a subsidy? Mr. President, if it is a subsidy, then the Democratic Party has been favoring subsidies ever since there was a Democratic Party.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. We will be confronted with a good-sized bunch of them when the river and harbor bill comes here from the other House.

Mr. REED. Subsidy! We frequently get ourselves involved in difficulty by trying to go into refinements of reason and refinements of meaning when, as a matter of fact, if we will take language in its ordinary meaning in connection with the subject with which we are dealing there will be no difficulty.

There is not a Senator of the United States who has ever used the term ship subsidy in his life up to the time this debate began, when refinements of reason became very necessary, who ever thought of anything else except the Republican proposition of paying a bounty to a vessel that would carry the American flag, and so forth. He never thought of applying it to a river improvement; he never thought of applying it to a harbor improvement; he never thought of applying it there any more than he thinks of applying the term subsidy to the farmers of this country when there is an appropriation made to kill the boll weevil. The kind of subsidy we have always been dealing with, when we talked about subsidy, is the direct subsidy; but when we have been talking about this other question we have been dealing with the proposition of improving the facilities of commerce; and what have we done along that line? There were a great many vessels plying upon our inland seas. If you had proposed to Congress to pay them a bonus upon the tonnage they carried, every Democrat, at least, would have voted against it, and a great many Republicans. But if on some day you proposed to appropriate $250,000 to remove some rocks out of the channel through which these boats must pass, and to deepen the channel, so that commerce could pass over it, it would be voted not as a subsidy but merely as an aid to commerce. Everybody understands that distinction. Gentlemen can stand here and talk until they are black in the face, and they will not even convince themselves that they have been successful in producing a gold brick that will deceive their own judgment.

What have we done? it has been asked here many times. Just let us rehearse it. We started in spending millions and millions of dollars on the Ohio River. We acquired canals that had been privately owned and we built canals. As one said this morning, there is a bill now in Congress to expend $3,000,000 to buy a canal from Philadelphia to Baltimore—that is a toll canal—and to give it to commerce free, aye, to give it to this wicked trust we have heard so much about, for the boats that will ply on that canal are just as much in combination as these other boats. We have appropriated, or approved a plan to appropriate, $20,000,000 for the improvement of the Missouri River. We have appropriated altogether and paid altogether, I think, nearly $800,000,000 for the improvement of the waterways of this country, and whether it is a channel dug through a lake, or a canal dug across the dry ground, or whether it is the removal of stumps and bars in rivers, or whether it is the dredging of harbors, in every instance it has been done since the foundations of this Republic without anybody ever attaching the word "subsidy" to it.

Now, let us assume for a moment that there had not been any treaty with England, and that by honest methods we had acquired a strip of land 10 miles wide across the Isthmus of Panama and without regard to any other nation on earth, but simply because we wanted to promote competition between the transcontinental railroads and the boats plying along our coasts we had expended $400,000,000 to build that canal, how would we have undertaken to justify it to the people of the United States? We would have justified the expenditure of that money as we have justified the expenditure of every dollar that has been expended since the foundation of the Government in improving harbors, rivers, and lakes, and in the acquisition of canals, namely, upon the sole ground that the Government of the United States was providing a means of communication between the different parts of this country, and it was doing no more and no less than it would do if it built a public highway across the land upon which the commerce of the people could move. We would have replied the benefit comes back to the people of the United States in recompense for the taxes they shall pay in the form of a cheaper transportation and a less tax upon the industry and the production of the land. That would have been the answer we would have returned. No man could have or would have cried "subsidy," because we would have been doing a few hundred miles from our coast that which we are now doing within the body of the United States itself. The claim of subsidy would not have been upon the lips of any man.

How can you justify permitting vessels to go through this canal engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States? I am putting aside the treaty now for a moment. You can justify it upon the hypothesis that as an original proposition the great causes for building this canal were two—one to add to our strength in time of war, which I need not pause to discuss, and the other to cheapen the cost of transportation between the Pacific and the Atlantic and to create an actual, active rival for the railroads and force a reduction of railroad rates.

That is the argument that was advanced. Those are the reasons why we built this canal. We did not build it out of any chimerical love of humanity. We did not build it as a benefaction to the world. We built this canal and the people were content to pay for it, because they believed it would add to our strength in time of war, for the reason that it would permit our fleets to pass from the Atlantic to the Pacific by the short route and from the Pacific back to the Atlantic, so that we could meet with our entire fleet an enemy in either sea, and so that we could mass our entire fleet upon either coast that was menaced. We did it for the other reason that we wanted to get the products of the East and the products of the West back and forth at the least possible cost. The people were content under those circumstances to pay for the canal.

If the purpose was to produce a rival for the railroads and to force a reduction of railroad rates, then just in proportion as you increase the burdens upon the shipping you decrease the ability of the owner of the vessel to compete, and every dollar you add to the cost of hauling goods through the canal you enable the railroads to add to every pound of freight they carry across the continent overland. It is because of the consideration that a reduction of the water tolls to the lowest rates will force a reduction of the land tolls on the vast volume of trade that crosses the country that some of us voted originally for this tolls exemption.

I do not like to see Senators whom I regard highly stand upon this floor and hear them say that those who oppose the repeal of the tolls exemption are doing it in the interest of a shipping trust. It is an unfair argument, and it puts the Democratic Party in the position of having voted for the shipping trust and having favored the shipping trust at the session of Congress in 1912 when we passed the act.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Does it not put them in the still worse position of tacitly admitting that this administration does not intend to enforce the prohibition in the existing law against monopolized ships or ships owned by railroads?

Mr. REED. I was coming to that. It also puts the Democratic Party in a position of having either through ignorance or willfully in its platform in Baltimore taken the side of the coastwise shipping monopoly, a proposition that I repudiate, and then it puts us in the position suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] a moment ago, which I need not repeat. Is that fair? Is that true? Is there any Senator who will rise in this Chamber and look me in the eye or any other man in the eye and say that the Democrats voted in favor of a ship monopoly, intending further to enable that monopoly to feather its nest and to pluck the feathers from the body of honest commerce, if I may use so very bad a metaphor?

Let me show you what the other side of that would be and how unfair it would be to argue this question in the same spirit on the other side. It would be for Senators to rise in their seats and say to every man who wants to put a toll upon these vessels, "You are working for the transcontinental railroad, are you not? You know that every time you increase the cost of transporting goods by water you help the railroad monopoly, and therefore with that diabolical purpose in your heart you are here trying to put this toll up to a prohibitive point so that the railroads may continue to enjoy their monopoly and pluck and plunder the country."

The man who would make that argument would not be fair, and the man who charges that those Members who believe in toll exemption are in league with monopoly and are the servants of combinations is as unfair as I would be if I turned upon those on the other side and asked them whether they were working for the Southern Pacific or the Northern Pacific Railroad. Shame upon that kind of argument! It reflects no credit upon its authors. It convinces the judgment of no man. It makes no votes unless there be cowards who can be driven.

Mr. President, there is another consideration, and that is that in the canal act itself we struck a deadly blow at the Shipping Trust. We provided that the railroads that had already begun to take steps to control water competition could not send their railroad-owned boats through the canal. We struck at the railroad monopoly in that bill, and at the same time we struck at the coastwise combination. If that law is faithfully enforced, there will be no coastwise monopoly plying through that canal, either with tolls or without tolls, for at the threshold of the canal the monopoly-controlled and the railroad-owned boats will be halted, and the canal will either not be used for coastwise business or there will come to its gates vessels that are not controlled by railroads or combinations. If the law is honestly enforced, the result must be that these railroads will be forced to dispose of their boats to independent owners, that the combination must be broken up, or otherwise the independent boats, a few of which exist, will get all the business of the canal and will have such an advantage that the combination can not live in competition with them.

Now, that being true, why should we stand here and rave over the proposition that there is a coastwise monopoly and claim that this provision in the act was for the benefit of that monopoly, when by the very act that exempted vessels from tolls we expressly provided that a railroad-owned vessel and a monopoly-controlled vessel should not pullute the waters of the canal.

You see, you do not argue fairly when you argue that way. You must assume that the law will be enforced, and the moment you assume that the law will be enforced, then your monopoly is barred from the use of the canal. Why stand here and try to hide behind the coat tails of a monopoly when you have already decreed the death, dissolution, and burial of that monopoly by denying it any chance to enter this canal?

There is another way to kill that monopoly. That is to adopt the amendment which I offered, and at the proper time will submit, and that is to admit into the coastwise trade of the United States every vessel desiring to enter it.

Now, "all ye who labor and are heavy laden" with monopoly, who have spent your time upon this floor denouncing the coastwise trade of the United States as a monopoly, who have declared that it is so bad and so wicked a thing that it ought to be penalized out of business through the imposition of tolls—all ye who declare yourselves the enemies of special privilege and who claim that all these special privileges are contrary to the principles of the Democratic Party, come let us reason together.

I do not believe in special privilege. I do not believe that a thing which can not exist in the pure free air of competition, that has to be supported artificially, ever produced a penny of genuine profit.

When an industry can not stand alone and yet is found standing, it must be supported by some other institution capable of standing alongside the weekling and holding it up. An institution which does not possess sufficient vitality to exist and yet does exist must be living off of energies which it does not produce. It is necessarily a parasite feeding upon that which is produced by others.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to make an observation. It has just occurred to me how singular indeed it is that during the campaign of 1912, when all the western speakers were instructed to dwell emphatically upon the platform and especially upon the tolls-exemption provision to catch votes in the West, the idea of a subsidy did not apear to those who at that time stood upon the platform and urged us to point out the beneficent features of that provision.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, for nearly a hundred years we have been endeavoring to build up a merchant marine by granting to vessels built and owned in the United States the sole right to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States. At the end of that long period of time what do we find? What is our reward? What recompense comes to us from this fostering and pampering? The Senator from New York has extensively examined into the question. The committee of the House of Representatives, after long investigation, has filed its report. We are told by both of these authorities that nearly 92 per cent of all line vessels engaged in the coastwise trade are either controlled by the railroads or in combination. Aside from the line vessels there are of course many tramp vessels, both sail and steam. These vessels do not run upon regular lines. It is conceded that but few of the so-called tramp vessels will pass through the canal. It is also conceded that practically none of these vessels will be of assistance as auxiliaries in time of war.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like once more to call the Senate's attention to the incorrectness, I think, of the statement which has just been inadvertently made by the Senator from Missouri, in that he is using the figures which apply to line traffic—that is, direct lines of steamers—and not to the total traffic of the country. There are about 800,000 tons in steamers that are either controlled by railroads or controlled by large companies, which is the tonnage included in the figures which the Senator from Missouri has just quoted; but the total tonnage of the United States engaged in the coastwise and lake traffic is between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000 tons. So only about 10 per cent of the total tonnage is the tonnage which the Senator from Missouri has just quoted as being 90 per cent of the total coastwise tonnage of the country.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand, I think, with a reasonable degree of accuracy the situation and the distinction which the Senator from Massachusetts makes. Practically all of the "line vessels" are in combination or are controlled and owned by the railroads, and that applies to and embraces the line vessels carrying through freight upon the Great Lakes, which embrace the larger part of the tonnage to which the Senator referred when he said "the greater amount" a moment ago.

In addition to those vessels there are a larger number of vessels not running in lines; but, Mr. President, the hearings before the House committee showed that, as to those vessels, the great majority of them are owned by companies with interlocking directorates, so that to all intents and purposes the great mass of all the coastwise business upon the seas is under the control of what would be commonly termed a trust or combination. I think I am safe in that statement; and if I am not, of course I want to be corrected.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Missouri wishes to be accurate in his statements, but I think he has been misled by the reports made by the committee of the other House and has not examined them as carefully as he does most matters. I think I could demonstrate, if I had the time—and I may before this debate is over put into the RECORD—just who controls all the coastwise traffic of the United States; and the Senator from Missouri will see from such a statement that the reference which he has just made can not be accurate.

Mr. O'GORMAN and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from New York, who first addressed the Chair, and then I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I think on a former occasion I made a statement in the Senate substantially similar to the one now made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and that was that 92 per cent of the vessels engaged in the American coastwise trade are either owned or controlled by the railroads of the country or form part of a shipping combination.

No more exhaustive investigation of that subject, perhaps, was ever made in the history of this Government than that made by the so-called Alexander committee in the other House, and that was the conclusion reached by that committee; that is the statement contained in the report of the committee, after weeks and months of inquiry into this subject.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me just one moment, I will say that I do not wish to prolong this debate, but in order to correct what is a serious misapprehension of the character of the coastwise business, I shall take the time later to put into the RECORD the exact facts relating to coastwise shipping.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am glad to hear the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] make the statement that he has. I think there has been an entire misapprehension of this question. I think a careful examination of even the Alexander report will not sustain the contention that is being made either by the Senator from Missouri or by the Senator from New York. I think so, among other reasons, for this reason: About two months ago I received a letter from a Boston shipping man who claimed to be very familiar with the situation. I laid it on top of my desk with the intention of showing it to the Senator from Georgia, who had made an address upon the subject; but it was lost with other papers that are swept away from our desks here after the daily adjournment of the Senate. So I am unable to state now from whom it was; but the writer called attention to the point of distinction and to the point of confusion to which I have alluded, and he said that the amount of tonnage controlled by railroads and by railroad-owned ships, by liners that were controlled by railroads, and by ships controlled by corporations which were not trusts, so to speak, was not over one-third of the total tonnage of the coastwise trade on the Atlantic coast; and that there was severe competition between the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade on the Atlantic coast. I can not give the exact figures and proportions, but I am satisfied that there is a confusion existing upon that subject which I do not think is even warranted by the statements in the Alexander report. I am glad the Senator from Massachusetts will clear it up.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I examined the Alexander report, I thought, with reasonable care, and reached the conclusion from my examination which I first stated. The Senator from Connecticut and the Senator from Massachusetts arrived at a different conclusion; but if I were to take the figures just given by the Senator from Connecticut and were to say that only one-third of the coastwise business of the United States had combined itself in violation of the principles of law, that it had been seized upon by the railroads, and thus its competition with the railroads removed, I would yet be justified, and abundantly justified, in saying that the favors we have heaped upon the coastwise vessels of the country had met with poor recompense. If the figures given by the Senator from Oklahoma as to rates charged are correct, then there is a just cause of complaint against vessels in the coastwise trade. Instead of appearing in the light of servants of the people, fostered and protected as they have been, they would appear to be engaged in a conspiracy little short of robbery. If it be true, as stated by the Senator from Oklahoma, that goods can be shipped from England in English bottoms 12,000 miles for less than is charged for hauling them 800 miles in a coastwise vessel of the United States, then, instead of protecting and fostering and preserving a monopoly of that kind, we ought to be glad to compel it to meet competition and to fix its rates in competition with the world.

Mr. President, there is another reason—and I am going to appeal to those western Senators who are paying me the compliment of their attention, why the amendment I have in mind ought to be adopted.

The suggestion was well put by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] a few days ago, that when this canal is opened if all coastwise vessels pay the same tolls, then this is bound to result: That the Canadian ports upon the east and the west, being open to the vessels of all nations and enjoying the advantages of the competitive rates fixed by the boats of all countries, will obtain rates so much lower than will be granted by the coastwise monopoly of the United States, that every Canadian port on the east and every Canadian port on the west will have the advantage over ports of the United States on the eastern and western coasts just to their south. Goods will be landed by vessels flying the flag of England and of every other country. Goods will be transported from Canadian ports at such an advantage that the Canadian farmer upon his wheat, the Canadian merchant upon his goods, the Canadian lumberman upon his lumber, the Canadian citizen, whatever his vocation in life, will enjoy a lower rate than we will be able to obtain from vessels protected by our maritime laws from any competition. The inevitable result will be, if we do not open our ports to the vessels of all nations, that the United States ports will be at a disadvantage with Canadian ports. I do not want to indulge in any extreme statement; no man can look into the future and say that he has the right to speak with certainty, but I fear if we open the Panama Canal to vessels of all nations and do not at the same time open our ports to the vessels of all nations that the canal will prove a commercial disadvantage instead of an advantage to us.

I know how useless it is sometimes to try to talk to the Senate. There is a formative period here when opinions are changed. Then we reach a point where opinion has in a measure crystallized, and at that point talking is of but little use, particularly when the one attempting to talk is no more gifted than am I. I heard of an old farmer who had the reputation of being a sort of amateur veterinary surgeon, for whom the neighbors sent in emergencies. They brought him on one occasion to look at a sick calf. He looked at it a minute, when observing that its eyes were steadfastly fixed, and having seen calves in that condition before, he said: "There is no use wasting medicine on the critter; his eyes are sot." I do not know whether at this period of the debate I can enlist the interest of Senators, but I want to put this case to you: If you were about to establish a great wholesale house upon the western coast and you had your option to establish that house at Portland, Oreg., or to establish it at Vancouver, and you expected to sell your goods to the great Northwest, and you realized that into the port of Portland no vessel could come except a vessel engaged in the coastwise trade, flying the American flag, and that there was in fact no real competition between these vessels, and that as conditions are now there is no real competition between them and the railroads which own them, and you had the other option offered of locating your wholesale establishment in Vancouver, where every day there would be at the wharves not only the coastwise vessels of the United States, if they dared to go there to compete, but the vessels of every nation on earth, the liners and the tramps, as a man possessing ordinary business sense, at which place would you locate your great wholesale establishment?

I turn now to my friends from the eastern coast, to the—and I use the term kindly—to the Yankee statesmen upon this floor, and ask them, the Senators from Maine and Massachusetts, to ponder well what may be the effect of taking through the canal products from eastern Canada, from the Canadian cities just north of you, and carrying those goods at the cheapest possible rates, in bottoms that compete each with the other and that sail under every flag known to the breezes of heaven; what will be the effect upon your industries, upon your manufactures? Will you not be forced, in order to save your manufacturers from a competition that will spring directly out of the existence of the Panama Canal, to sacrifice the boat monopoly that has so long existed?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the statement which the Senator has just so forcefully made will lead him to vote against the pending bill. That will be the surest way of preventing the turning over of this trade to our foreign rivals.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not sure at all that the tolls will be sufficient to compensate; I am not sure at all that if we took entirely off our ships the tolls which will be charged other vessels going through the canal we would have yet equalized the difference in freight rates charged by the coastwise vessels of the United States and the rates which are charged by the vessels of the world. I am informed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that toll exemption would not nearly equalize conditions; but in so far as it would, candor, of course, compels the statement that it would aid to that extent.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, his reference at the outset of his address, wherein he declared that he thought there was a fair understanding in certain quarters that the amendment which has been offered might be agreeable to the Government of Great Britain, I desire to read a most remarkable statement which I have clipped from the London Times of April 30, 1914. It is as follows:

[From our own correspondent.]

AMENDMENT OF THE PANAMA BILL—SENATE COMMITTEE'S ACTION.

WASHINGTON, April 29.

The Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals is holding this afternoon its final meeting on the Panama tolls-repeal bill. The atmosphere of the committee is not friendly, and the chances are that the bill will be reported either without recommendation or with a suggestion that it be amended. Whichever course is followed, it is beginning to be agreed that the measure is almost certain to be amended during debate.

Which is the situation in which we are now placed.

In face of the popular opposition to repeal manifested since the President's message urging repeal, Mr. Wilson is stated to have weakened in his determination to accept no amendment. The aim of his lieutenants will now be to secure that the change shall, if possible, be inoffensive to Great Britain.

Think of it! And that, I take it, is the aim of the amendment which has been proposed—to be inoffensive to Great Britain.

Their present idea is that they will accomplish that end if they can persuade the preferentialists to accept a rider to the bill to the effect that the passage of the bill does not prejudice any rights of the United States under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Think of it! Is there a Senator, in view of the knowledge and light shed by that clipping from the leading paper of Great Britain, who would stand up here and so forget his duty and obligations to his country as to vote to acquiesce in this nefarious scheme?

LATER.

The committee have decided to suggest the amendment already outlined. Senators do not believe that Great Britain will object, and should they be right, feel sanguine that the measure can be put through. The chances are that acceptance of the amendment by the administration, the Mexican trouble, and the general pressure of business will combine to curtail debate somewhat. The preferentialists, at any rate, will not be able to use with such effect as they did in the House their favorite argument that American rights are thrown overboard.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been discussing for a moment the effect upon the cities and industries of our eastern and western coasts. I pause long enough to call the attention of Senators from the interior of the country and Senators from the South to the fact that they are interested, not in as direct a manner as would be the cities of the North Pacific coast of the United States and of the North Atlantic coast of the United States, but, nevertheless, interested, and gravely interested. Let us assume the establishment of a great industry at New Orleans having to draw a portion of its supplies from the eastern coast of this country and a portion of its supplies from the western coast to be engaged in manufacturing products and, in turn, shipping those products all over the world. If such an industry needed lumber from the West and was obliged to pay the rates fixed by our coastwise vessels, if it needed iron from the East and was obliged to pay the rates fixed by our coastwise vessels, and, having manufactured a product, sought to compete with the Canadian product in the markets of Europe, and the Canadian could haul at a cheaper rate his original goods used in manufacturing, would not the manufacturer at New Orleans be at a disadvantage?

Nor is it true, Mr. President, as has been said here frequently in debate, that the tolls on the Panama Canal will affect only the eastern, western, and southern coasts of our country. The tolls charged for the canal and also the freight charged by the boats engaged in the coastwise trade will inevitably affect the railroad tolls of the entire country, and will in turn affect the industries of the great interior, if not so much as those of the eastern and western coasts, at least to a material degree.

Let us examine that for a moment. Let me take my own State in illustration.

It never was intended that when we had built this canal we should cease building waterways. Congress has already made appropriations for the improvement of the Mississippi River. A vast system of improvement is going on. Organizations exist having for their object the procurement of at least a 14-foot channel from St. Louis, Mo., to the mouth of the river. The work is under way. Now, let us assume that in the city of St. Louis there is a manufacturer who is selling his goods all over the United States and all over the world. Is he in any way concerned in this canal? I answer, he is vitally concerned. Why? Because now, if he desires to reach the western coast or the great western country, he must ship his goods by railroad, and must pay the railroad rates. Every man who has studied the railroad rates applying to the great West knows how unjustly that entire country has been treated; and I include in the great West my own State. But, sir, when this canal is completed, immediately there will be set up a new line of competition. The north-and-south railroads running from St. Louis and points north clear to the Gulf of Mexico can not now enter into rivalry with the transcontinental lines; but the moment this canal is finished, if we act wisely, the merchant can at once enjoy a competition, for the north-and-south lines will haul his goods to the Gulf ports, a new element will enter into the competition, and the result will be that there must be better rates made from St. Louis to the great West, or else the transcontinental lines will lose the business; and instead of going, as it does now, all by rail east and west, it will go over the north-and-south railways and through the canal.

That will not only benefit the manufacturer at St. Louis but it will benefit the consumer in all of the great coast States, the Mountain States, and inevitably all of the United States.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. REED. I will yield to the Senator from Idaho in one moment.

That is a condition which will obtain immediately. It is as certain as fate itself. But, sir, when the Mississippi River is but slightly improved great barges will be moving up and down that stream, and there will be an actual water competition all the way from the city of St. Louis to Portland, Oreg.; and in like manner there will be a means of water communication between Boston, Mass., and St. Louis, Mo.; and that water competition will lower the price of all the staple goods that are used in the great interior of the United States. So you can not say that if you grant exemption from tolls you are taxing all of the country for the benefit merely of the East and West.

The Senator from Idaho has been waiting. I yield to him.

Mr. BORAH. In connection with the point which the Senator is making I desire to call attention to an article in the Chicago Record-Herald, under date of June 3, 1914. It is entitled:

SHIPPERS TO BENEFIT BY OPENING OF CANAL—CUT OF 40 TO 50 PER CENT IN WATER RATES FROM PACIFIC COAST IS PREDICTED—ESTIMATE BELIEVED FAIR—PROBABLE REDUCTIONS PREPARED BY SAN FRANCISCO COMMERCE BODY.

The first concrete evidence of the benefit the Panama Canal will work to shippers was offered yesterday by the foreign trade department of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce.

According to a prospectus issued by the department all water rates on shipments from San Francisco to points on the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers will be reduced from 40 to 50 per cent when the canal is opened to commerce. A rate table has been compiled showing the estimated reductions in rates on shipments of numerous California products. The table takes into account figures supplied by barge companies operating on the rivers.

The statement is held by shippers to be a fair estimate of the reductions that will be made in rates between all points affected by the opening of the canal. They believe that corresponding reductions will be announced on shipments from river points to the Pacific coast and between river points and Atlantic ports.

One thing more, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The London Outlook a few days ago said that on the basis of the crop of 1912 the farmers of Alberta alone will receive an annual benefit of $200,000,000 by reason of the opening of the canal. It added:

It is easy to see that it is not far hence when farmers of Alberta and Saskatchewan will receive a free gift from this canal of something in the neighborhood of $250,000,000 a year in foreign rates saved.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the Senator for his contribution, which is very illuminating.

Mr. President, for my part I have looked forward to the opening of this canal as the beginning of a wonderful era of prosperity for our country. I have believed, sir, that without injustice to any railroad interest the inevitable result of the construction of the canal would be an active water competition between boats and railroads upon all classes of heavy freight. I have believed, and yet believe, that every dollar you take off the cost of transportation is a dollar added to the net value of the product imported. It is that much money saved for the pocket of the producer or the pocket of the consumer. I have believed that every dollar taken off the cost of transportation was in practical effect a reduction of distance, and that when you make it possible to move from the interior of this country to the coast for $1 an article that now costs $2, you have in practical effect divided in the middle the distance between the two points. I have believed that the construction of the Panama Canal would break the strangle hold which railroads have upon certain communities, even under the rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the beneficent mandates of that body. I have believed that instead of the basic rates being fixed upon certain selected points having water competition, as they are now, the basic point of rates would be affected by the introduction of this new line of competition, and that that would be extended along the line of every north-and-south railroad, so that we would have inaugurated in the United States practically three independent competing forces—the transcontinental east-and-west railroads, the north-and-south railroads, the coastwise and lake traffic; and, in addition to that, in the near future we would introduce a large traffic upon the great rivers of the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. REED. In a moment.

If that results, the advantage it will give to our country can not be measured in figures or even grasped by the imagination.

In illustration, business is frequently done upon a close margin, particularly business that competes in the open markets of the world. A difference of a few cents in freight rates may mean the difference between a prosperous year and a bad year for any manufacturing institution. If by the building of this canal, if by the introduction of these new forces of competition, we can reduce freight rates, it may mean—indeed, I believe it will mean—such additional advantage to the commerce and industries of our country as will enable us to meet competition in every land, and to gather gold in every clime.

I now yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am very much interested in what the Senator has said. I should like to have him reply to the argument which has been made here by some of the Senators that if rates are too high between the Middle West and the West, or between the Middle West and the East, the Interstate Commerce Commission has absolute power to correct those evils. If the views of the Senator are correct, and these rates are unjust, I should like to have him discuss the question whether the contention of Senators is well founded that the Interstate Commerce Commission might possibly regulate these rates.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hesitate to go into that branch of the discussion, because it is a large one; but I have always maintained that the middle sections of this country and the great West have never had fair railroad rates, nor anything approximating fair railroad rates, notwithstanding the existence of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator from Missouri, if he will permit it.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. If what the Senator is looking to, the cheapening in time of rates by remitting the tolls through the canal, would absolutely take away from the great transcontinental railroads any of the terminal freights, would it not inevitably result in the increase of the rates in the interior, if the railroads are permitted to live—and I suppose they expect to live?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that argument, carried to its legitimate conclusion, would lead us to go down immediately and dynamite the canal, lest the interior of the country might be ruined by the existence of the canal. I think that completely answers the argument. It goes too far. It leads to too bad a conclusion.

Has it come to this: That we have built the canal only to discover that water rates are going to be too cheap, goods can be hauled for too small an amount of money, and therefore we must put burdens upon the vessels so that they can not give the people cheaper rates lest the railroads retaliate and charge it up to somebody else? If that is true, we ought never to build another boat, we ought never to dig another canal, we ought never to appropriate another dollar for waterway improvement, because the railroads in the end would punish somebody for all the benefits we had created. That will not do. It is not sound argument.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a further interruption——

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. If the railroads are barely living now at the present rates, and they can not reduce expenses, then, if the terminal freights are taken away from them, does it not necessarily follow that the interior rates will have to be increased in order that the railroads may continue to exist?

Mr. REED. If I were to admit all of the Senator's premise, of course I would answer "yes"; and if the Senator will permit me to frame a question in my own way, I can always compel him to answer "yes," if he answers frankly, as he will.

I am going to spend just one moment on this question and then pass on.

There is no justification, and there never has been any justification, in morals or in justice, for a railroad to charge less than a fair price for hauling goods to a point, whether there is competition or whether there is not competition; and nothing is more unjust than to allow a railroad, because it has competition at a certain point, to haul goods to that point at a loss and then tax up the loss to somebody else. We are going to come to a time in this country very soon, I hope, when every part of the country will be put upon exactly the same basis with reference to rates. By that I mean not, of course, the same rates in dollars and cents, but the same rates taking into consideration the physical conditions, the density of population, and the amount of goods to be carried. The time will come very soon when the railroads will not be permitted to haul goods through Salt Lake City to the Pacific coast and then haul them back to Salt Lake City for less than they will haul them direct to Salt Lake City. I use Salt Lake City merely as illustrative. The same is true of Denver and other places.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon an interruption, as an illustration of the accuracy of the Senator's opinion, I want to submit to him an experience which his own city had and the region of the country where I live.

There was a controversy, as he will remember, some years ago, looking to the reduction of the rates from the East to Kansas City, and a counterclaim was made that the rates from Kansas City to central Kansas points should be equivalently reduced, since otherwise it would give Kansas City a lower rate, and the rate from Kansas City west not being changed, it would give Kansas City an advantage over the distributing points west of Kansas City.

A reduction, however, was made of 4 cents a hundred on traffic into Kansas City, and the rates west of Kansas City were left the same. On a certain commodity the rate from the East to Salina, Kans., was 56 cents a hundred before the reduction, 24 cents to Kansas City, and 32 cents from Kansas City to Salina. A reduction of 4 cents was made in the rate to Kansas City; that is, it was reduced from 24 to 20 cents. That reduction was reflected in the through rate to Salina, that rate being reduced from 56 cents to 52—and that will happen everywhere where there is a reduction in any rate. It is always reflected in any joint rates that are made for that point, and must be.

Mr. REED. I wish to answer further the interrogatory of the Senator from Georgia, and particularly his premise, which he put in the form of a question. If the railroads are already carrying as cheaply as possible, then, the Senator inquired, what would they do if lower rates were made through water transportation?

Mr. WEST. Not lower rates, but less hauling.

Mr. REED. Very well; less hauling. I do not know how that particular matter will work out, but I pause long enough to make this observation: If this canal cheapens rates to the great interior, as I have argued it will, and as I believe it will, then the increased population and the increased traffic and business which must be done by the railroads will speedily more than recompense the railroads for the losses incident to the through traffic upon heavy freights. The trouble with the railroads in the West and in many parts of the South is that they proceed through countries sparsely settled and with but a limited manufactured output. There will be a compensation as I have indicated, in my opinion; but, whether there is or not, the railroads must face the competition through this canal; and if the canal competition is going to destroy the railroads, and therefore is a wicked enterprise, we ought to blow out its locks to-morrow, if it is going to ruin and injure the country—a thing that I utterly deny, but to which the logic of the Senator's question would drive us.

I pause, however, to make another remark. I hear a great deal of talk about the poor railroads, their inability to pay interest and dividends, and of the effort to raise rates; but I have not seen any of these railroad presidents meeting together in solemn session for the purpose of squeezing the water out of their stocks. I have not seen them dissolving their holding corporations. We have heard much of the New Haven Railroad scandal, and, of course, it has shocked the conscience of the American people; but the New Haven Railroad is not alone. I might call your attention to the fact that railroad after railroad in this country is capitalized by underlying bonds and stocks, and then that a holding company has been organized to hold the voting majority of the stocks, and that that holding company has issued its stocks and its bonds, and then another holding company has been organized for the holding company, and more stocks and more bonds issued, and in the case of the Rock Island Co. still another holding company for a holding company of a holding company. Thus there has been pyramided a burden of stocks and bonds upon which no railroad can earn interest or dividends. Some day I am going to take a little of the time of the Senate to call attention to some of these matters.

This, however, is all aside from the question. I take it that the Senate is agreed that we ought to reduce the rates of transportation as far as we can by the employment of natural advantages, supplemented by such artificial advantages as it is proper for the Government to create. That being true, and it having been asserted here by Senator after Senator that the coastwise business of this country is controlled by a monopoly, that it is a conscienceless monopoly, that it is a monopoly largely owned and controlled by the railroads, that it exists to-day for the purpose of preventing what little water competition there might be, I challenge their attention to their own statements. I ask them, Why not apply to these concerns that have been granted immunity from competition for a hundred years, the doctrine of the Democratic platform, that where there is a monopoly the tariff advantage should be repealed, and in this instance, applying the principle, repeal the advantage we have by law given the coastwise monopoly? Why not do what England and other up-to-date countries have done, admit all vessels to enter our ports and transport goods?

When you do that, Mr. President, you will have destroyed the advantage which the Canadian ports will have over the American ports through the use of the canal. You will have put our coast cities upon the same beneficial level the Canadian coast cities will occupy. You will have put our vast interior in the same position of advantage the people of the interior of Canada will enjoy, because instead of compelling our merchants to load their goods into vessels owned and controlled by a monopoly and compelling them to pay that monopoly its prices you will give them the benefit of the same competition as to water rates that every Canadian citizen will enjoy. When you do that you will have at once destroyed the coastwise monopoly of the United States and you will have answered the complaint of England and of all the world as to a violation of this treaty.

Mr. President, that leads me to a suggestion which I have not heard elaborated, at least upon this floor. I deny, sir, in express terms that this treaty is violated by the clause in our statute which provides that vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States may pass through the canal free. Mark you, by treaty, according to the construction which is insisted upon by some of our friends and by the President, we agreed to allow the vessels of all nations to go through the canal on equal terms, and they claim that includes the vessels of the United States. Let us grant it for the moment. At what point in the law have we discriminated against the vessels of other nations? We have not said vessels of the United States or sailing under the American flag shall go through the canal free. We have not said vessels sailing under our flag shall go through free, but the vessels of other nations shall pay tolls. We have said all vessels except those engaged in the coastwise trade shall pay tolls, and that the vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States shall go through free.

In what respect, then, have we violated the treaty? If we have violated the treaty, it is by the enactment of a statute that is purely local to the United States, and that concerns its internal affairs and business, and that is not found in the clause complained of in the law under discussion.

I want to make that, if I can, a demonstration. If we were to repeal our coastwise laws to-morrow, which everybody admits we have the right to do, by repealing our coastwise laws, which is a thing of our own business, which no nation on earth has any right to interfere with, which is local to ourselves and of our own concern, we would remove the objection offered by England. In other words, England is not complaining here and can not complain here of the terms of the law under consideration. England is, in fact, demanding that we shall waive the right which we possess and every nation possesses of saying who shall go into the coastwise business. The United States to-morrow could amend its coastwise laws and provide that all vessels sailing under the English flag could engage in the coastwise trade, and by amending that law, which is our own business and which has nothing to do with treaties, remove the objection of England.

What England is trying to do is to deny to the United States the right to regulate its coastwise vessels an. to say under what terms they shall sail. It is a wholly distinct proposition of law from the one we have been discussing here for days. If we had written into this law, "All vessels sailing under the United States flag shall go through free," it would have been a discrimination in the law, but the discrimination which Great Britain complains of arises not from anything we put in the law, but from the fact that under another law of purely domestic concern we have seen fit to limit the class of vessels which can engage in our coastwise trade.

How can it be said that Great Britain in writing this treaty intended it to mean, and that our representatives intended it to mean, that we could not confer benefits upon a commerce which is as much an internal affair as is the question of a railroad running from New York to San Francisco?

I do not know whether I have made the question as clear as it is to my own mind. I repeat that we have not in the law now complained of discriminated at all. We have simply provided that a certain class of vessels shall go through free, and that all other vessels shall pay tolls; but the definition as to what constitutes that certain class of vessels is found in another law, which we had a perfect right to pass, that no one can question, a law that existed nearly a hundred years before the treaty was made with England.

I concede that if the coastwise business of the United States had when the treaty was made been open to the vessels of all nations and we had put in a clause exempting vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls and then immediately had passed a law excluding any but American-owned vessels from the coastwise trade, England might have said, "You have resorted to a subterfuge; you are trying to do indirectly that which you can not do directly." But, sirs, that is not the case here. Our coastwise vessels are operated under laws that antedate the treaty The privileges they enjoy of entering our ports and taking on passengers and freight existed before the treaty was made. We had the right to provide that they should be a certain length, if we saw fit; that they should carry a certain complement of men, if we saw fit; that they should carry guns or that they should go unarmed, if we saw fit. We had the right to say to them that they could not trade at all, if we saw fit, and we had the right to say to them they could enter our ports free of pilotage, if we saw fit, or enter one of our canals, if we saw fit, because all these questions are of purely internal concern. By amending the coastwise laws so as to admit the vessels of all nations to the coastwise trade we remove the objection of England, which is an absolute demonstration that that which she complains of is a condition not arising because of the tolls act but because of our coastwise laws, for by changing the coastwise law we remove the objection.

Mr. President, I am appealing to Senators upon this floor for a broad view. I am asking them to consider the welfare of the whole of the United States. I am asking Senators who have stood here and denounced the tolls act as in the interest of a monopoly and who have declared the coastwise business of the United States to be in the clutch of a monopoly to come with me and vote with me to break that monopoly down by the most effective means that have ever been employed to break a monopoly—that is, by bringing in competition. I ask them to do so not alone upon the narrow ground of destroying the monopoly, although that might well excite and delight a man who abominates a combination in restraint of trade, but I am asking them to do it upon the broader proposition that if we do not do it the ports of Canada will have an advantage over the ports of the United States. The farmer of Canada will have an advantage in the shipment of his wheat over the farmer of the United States; the manufacturer of Canada will have an advantage over the manufacturer of the United States; and why? Because the Canadian will have coming to Canadian ports and passing through the canal the vessels of all nations. He will have the advantage of the cut rates which come from keen and active competition. He will have the advantage of the regular line steamers and of the tramp steamers. He will have the advantage of rates that have been forced down upon the railroads of Canada through the water transportation that reaches the eastern and western coasts.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Beyond any question, if you do not admit to our ports the vessels of all nations and give our people the benefit of that competition, you will find out in the long run and at the end of the road that the canal we built at such tremendous expense has inured to the greater benefit of Canada, which contributed neither of genius nor money nor toil to its construction.

I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. With the permission of the Senator from Missouri, I wish to call attention to one statement indicating the tremendous advantages to be enjoyed by the Canadian farmer from the use of the Panama Canal.

In the first place, it will be noticed that in the transportation of the products of western Canada to the European market the use of the canal means a saving of 8,000 miles of travel, and in the London Outlook of recent date it was estimated that the new route opened by the Panama Canal will effect a saving of £40,000,000 annually—$200,000,000—to the farmers of Alberta alone, a single Province of western Canada, and that the Province of Saskatchewan will receive a free gift from the canal of £50,000,000—$250,000,000—a year in foreign rates saved on the basis of the crop yield in 1912. With this vast displacement of traffic it is not surprising that the rival railway interests are working all sources to prevent the exemption of tolls to American ships in the Panama Canal.

Mr. REED. Senators have said here in answer to interrogatories that they were ready to vote for the proposition contained in my amendment some time, but not now; some other day; at some more convenient season. Why not now? We are dealing with this question now. The amendment I propose will take out of the mouth of England and every other nation on earth the last possible objection, and will enable us to escape from a construction of the treaty which may be of incalculable disadvantage to our country. Why not now? Is the fact that the coastwise monopoly is a hundred years old a reason why we should perpetuate it a little longer? Will we lose any valuable time in the passage of this bill? We have spent two months and more now in its discussion. The question is ripe. It is before the country. Why not now? This is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation. If we are in the clutch of a railroad-controlled shipping monopoly, as Senators have solemnly averred, when will you get ready to vote to abolish it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If we have created a special pet and conferred upon it a special privilege, and for a hundred years violated the fundamental principles of the Democratic Party that we all do so much love, why not regenerate ourselves at this particularly interesting moment?

I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg to say to the Senator that some of us who have studied this question pretty carefully absolutely deny that there is any such thing as a monopoly in the coastwise trade. Again, I will suggest to the Senators that his scheme would turn over our coastwise trade to the tramp ships of Great Britain and other countries of Europe, and wipe out our coast shipping exactly as England, by her superior management of those matters, wiped out our over-seas commerce.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I did not expect the Senator, who always is noted for the calm manner in which he watches an advantage, to rise and denounce the very premise I have laid down and upon which I am trying to get a few Democrats into line on this proposition. Of course, I might digress now and discuss the proposition the Senator has raised. He denies that there is any monopoly. If this were a question of a political character, upon which political parties sometimes differ, and the Senator were to make that sort of a statement to me, I would simply regard it as a settled fact, and lay it by in the budget of my memory as an eternal truth, and would never afterwards venture to even question it. But this being a question upon which the mists of political doubt and difference have settled down, I am always afraid that the very able Senator is afflicted with a sort of intellectual strabismus that prevents him seeing things just as they are. I am sure he will never see them from my standpoint.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator's kindly observations, as well as his humorous observations, are appreciated by me; but the fact has been well established, as it can be established again, that while there are 330 ships that are in a combination, there are certain other ships, a limited number, controlled by railroads and companies that will not go into the canal. There are 24,000 coastwise ships out of the 27,000 that are no more in combination than are the automobiles which are run on our streets in Washington in combination. I say to the Senator again, Mr. President, if we open our coastwise shipping to the tramp steamers of England and France and Germany and Norway, with their cheaper crews than we can possibly under our laws admit to our ships, and with their cheaper food supplies, that our coastwise shipping will go exactly where our over-seas shipping has already gone.

Mr. REED. Ah, Mr. President, I know that is the Senator's honest opinion. I can not quarrel with him about matters of opinion, because he and I are of two diametrically opposite schools of political thought. We could no more agree upon a question of political opinion than a Mohammedan and a Christian could agree upon the doctrine of transubstantiation.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, I do not regard this as a political question. I think it is a business question, pure and simple.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, while the Senator from New Hampshire has spoken of the thousands of vessels that are not in the combination, he ought, as he said they were no more in combination than are the automobiles of the country, to be perfectly frank, and say to us that the vast majority of them could no more use the Panama Canal than could the automobiles of the country. He is including in that list every vessel plying upon the Great Lakes. They are in there, and they are going to stay there. All the great steamers that carry iron ore and other kinds of freight and passengers, which are built on the Lakes to remain on the Lakes. The Senator is including every little sailing craft. The truth about the matter is, if the House report is to be believed, that there is a tremendously powerful and potential combination. Mr. President, if that is true, why should we waste much of our time in worrying about what would happen to those boats if there were competition?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I will yield to the Senator before I proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am troubled, and have been troubled, over the great anxiety that is felt to destroy American vessels that may be in a combination. We exclude our ships that are owned or controlled by railroads from the Panama Canal, but permit the ships of Canada owned by two great railroad combinations to enter that canal. The same thing is true of these other matters. If we exclude ships that are in combination or controlled by trusts, why should we not try to exclude at least foreign ships that are so controlled in similar combinations? I do not like the idea of discriminating against our own people in that regard.

Mr. REED. In other words, England has a trust; therefore we ought to let our trusts run because England has a trust.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, we are in competition with those trusts of England. Not only are those vessels in trusts and combinations, but they have enormous subsidies direct from the Government of Great Britain, and from all other European Governments, and I say if we undertake to open our coastwise shipping under existing conditions to the ships of other countries, it will be absolutely blotted out as a natural result.

Mr. REED. Well, let us see. There is a trust in the United States and there is a trust in England. We are in the grip of a trust here. If we let the trust vessels of England come here, we will be using one trust with which to fight another trust, and the people who have to pay the freight will probably get some benefit when these two transportation pirates begin doing business against each other. If, on the other hand, one of them destroys the other, or absorbs the other, we shall, of course, be then in the position of having to meet that question in some other way. I do not say that competition is a complete remedy, but I do say that whenever I can stir up competition between the trusts of the world and set them fighting each other, I shall be very certain when I sic them on that I am engaged in the service of my country and of the Lord God of Hosts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, very likely that is true; but when the Senator from Missouri destroys a trust in his own country and maintains a trust of our competitor, I think the Lord God of Hosts might well be called upon to solve the problem.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not admit the premise of the Senator. The Senator has almost answered himself, although I know of no one who can steer clearer of the shoals than can the veteran debater from New Hampshire; but the Senator has asserted that there are thousands of vessels under the American flag that are not in the trust. The Senator will not pretend to say that there are not many more thousands of vessels engaged in the trade of the world not in a trust. Therefore if we were to admit the vessels of all nations to our ports, the trust-controlled vessels as well as the independent vessels, we would have competition between our own trust-owned vessels, our own nontrust-owned vessels, the trust vessels of other countries, and the thousands and tens of thousands of independent vessels, and until there was a world-wide combination the people would get the benefit.

Why not do this now? Why put it off? You Senators who cry there is a trust, all you who proclaim there is a trust, why not now dethrone that trust by interposing competition?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. But somebody will rise——

Mr. KERN. He has risen. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Indeed, as is suggested, he has risen. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Missouri that the coastwise shipping of the United States has been largely controlled by combinations—that is, the important routes, at least, have been—but I want to call his attention to a fact, which he well knows, that the very law which it is now sought to amend provides that vessels that are controlled by a trust can not use the Panama Canal. The Senator himself offered the amendment providing that. So that the trust that is disturbing some of our friends so much, who fear that it may be benefited by this legislation, can not profit by the canal. That canal alone of all the highways of the United States is made free from the operations of the trust.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the Senator from Kansas; but I had already discussed almost in the same words, though not so well, the very thought the Senator has expressed.

Mr. President, it will be replied that we are going to drive our flag from the ocean and that we shall have no vessels to use in time of war to transport our troops and our munitions of war. Why, Mr. President, when we had the little War with Spain, although we had been protecting by law the coastwise vessels of this country for nearly a hundred years, we had to buy foreign bottoms; we could not get boats at home. If at the end of a hundred years that is the result as to our national defense, I submit the argument ought to appeal to no man.

But that is not all. There is to be found in that circumstance an illustration of the patriotism and the cupidity of the coastwise shipping monopoly. After the War with Spain was over the United States had these old hulks upon her hands. She found a purchaser, but the purchaser wanted to sail them under the American flag and attach as a condition of purchase that the vessels should be admitted to American registry. Whereupon the coastwise monopoly swarm down on the Commerce Committee of the Senate as flies swarm about a pesthouse, like the lice came to Egypt. The coastwise patriots demanded that the United States should not even, for the purpose of selling the vessels it had purchased in time of war, register or permit the registering of those vessels under the American flag—an example of patriotism which makes it perfectly easy for me to understand why it was that the Savior said, "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the Kingdom of God."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I presume the Senator is aware of the fact that, if the owners of the coastwise ships did oppose giving American registry to certain ships, the labor unions and the laboring men of the country also opposed it.

Mr. REED. I do not think that there was any uprising on the part of the union labor of the country on that question. If there was, it did not come to my attention; and, if it had come to my attention, I should have been forced to say to union labor—once, at least, in my life—that I thought its position unjustifiable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, it is a fact that no class of our people are more solicitous about keeping American shipyards open than are the laboring men. They have a direct stake in the matter, and they do not want any legislation to be placed on our statute books that turns over our shipping interests to foreign countries.

Mr. REED. O Mr. President, our shipping interests are turned over to foreign countries.

Mr. GALLINGER. In part.

Mr. REED. There are not enough boats under the American flag engaged in the deep-sea trade to carry the corn from one good Iowa county across the ocean.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we all admit that; and that is a circumstance so deplorable and, from my point of view, so disgraceful to our country that it ought to be remedied.

Mr. REED. I think so, too. You have tried your plan for a hundred years, and the result is that there are practically no vessels with the American flag over them; and I think that almost any proposed remedy ought to be readily accepted, because it certainly could not bring about any worse conditions than those at present obtaining.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator's party undertook in the recent tariff law to remedy it; but that has proved abortive. Those of us who have been interested in the development of the over-seas shipping have been ready to try almost any reasonable remedy to accomplish the result. As I called attention yesterday, we had a few years ago three large ships belonging to the Oceanic Co. plying on the Pacific Ocean. They were losing money in competition with Japan, a subsidized shipping country, and they asked for relief; but certain Senators laughed at the idea that they needed relief. The result was that those ships were tied up at the docks in San Francisco to rot at their anchors. Two or three of them are now running to Australasia and to the Orient, because a colony of Great Britain, New Zealand, is helping to pay the loss which they otherwise would sustain. It is a deplorable situation, and one that ought to be remedied.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we get but a little distance along the line of this debate by undertaking to discuss everything "in the heavens above, the earth beneath, and the waters under the earth"; just to end this part of the discussion, as far as I am concerned, I call attention again to the patriotism of these gentlemen. I have not been in the Senate as long as most of its Members, but I remember that before the Commerce Committee a year or so ago some gentlemen appeared who desired to fit out a vessel to carry an exhibit of the products of the great West to the ports of other countries. They did not want to exhibit American products under a foreign flag. They went to the American shipping interests to try to buy a vessel, but they were asked a prohibitive price. They found a vessel under a foreign flag which they could buy for about one-third the amount demanded by the Shipping Trust of the United States. They came and asked for the privilege of registering it, so that in carrying American products to foreign ports they might exhibit them under the American flag. They were not doing it to make money; they were doing it for the purpose of advertising American products. But immediately there appeared before the Commerce Committee a representative of every shipyard in this country, demanding that we should not recommend a bill permitting this vessel to sail under the American flag. When they found the bill would be reported favorably they concluded to sell their vessel at a reasonable price. So, Mr. President, I see no benefit that has accrued to us during this hundred years of nursing and many years of monopoly.

I want to see freight rates reduced to the people of the United States, and you will reduce those freight rates, Senators, when you open the ports of the United States to the vessels of the world and give to the people of the United States the benefit of a world-wide competition. Nor do I believe our vessels will be driven from the seas. I believe we will build up a trade and commerce and we will build up a Navy by pursuing the policy England has pursued. England has opened her ports to the vessels of the world. She does not fear the Norwegian tramp steamer referred to by the Senator, and we need not fear it; for, if it comes to our ports and hauls our goods and people cheaper than the present monopoly will haul them, so much the better for the people of the United States. The day will come when we will restore our flag to the sea, not by undertaking to pamper, not by undertaking to subsidize, but by making conditions under which the vessels of the world can do business in our markets, and our vessels in like manner shall sail the seas and do business in the markets of other nations.

Mr. President, at the proper time I shall urge this amendment. I am urging it now, because it removes every difficulty from our path. Pass this amendment, and we have not conceded that England or any other country has rights in the canal which interfere with our dominion. Pass this amendment, and you break the monopoly that all of you, with the exception of the Senators from New Hampshire and Massachusetts, have asserted exists. Pass this amendment, and you give to the people of the United States an opportunity to meet upon equal terms the competition that is bound to exist the moment the canal is opened between Canadian ports and the ports of the United States. Fail to pass it, and you will have left a very large part of the United States at a disadvantage in the contest with England.

Mr. President, I challenge your attention to this proposition. The construction we place upon the treaty at this time will be a construction that will bind us to the last day of time, unless we escape from it by paying the price of the escape—I mean if we construe it wrongly. Let me tell Senators something. You may give this canal away, but as surely as there is a God of nations the people of the United States will take it back. Let me tell you something. You may concede away a part of the rights of the United States in this canal, but the people of the United States will recover them.

The people of the United States may not understand the intricacies of treaty construction; they may not understand the inner consciousness of the gentlemen who negotiated the treaty; but they will not inquire whether one of the negotiators of the treaty wrote the immortal ballad "Little Breeches," or whether another negotiator believed we should build a canal and grant it freely to the world. The people are spending but little time on those questions; but guided by a high sense of equity and justice, guided by that common sense which we sometimes call horse sense, which means good, practical sense, they know that it was American genius that conceived the canal, that it was American labor and American life that built the canal, that it was American dollars that produced the canal, that American guns are to be planted at both ends of the canal, that it is our canal, and you can not give it away if you try to do it.

Make no mistake. You might as well tell the man who bought the soil and paid for it, who raised the crop of potatoes and sweated as he planted and hoed and digged them, that they belong to the gentleman sitting on the fence and fanning himself, as to tell the people of the United States that they do not own the Panama Canal.

Treaty obligations? Yes. The United States should keep faith everywhere and always, but keeping faith does not necessarily consist in yielding all the demands your antagonist may make. If that were to be the construction or the rule of conduct, then the more avaricious a nation, the more unjust a nation, the greater would be its reward.

I remind Senators, as I did a while ago, that in dealing with their own property, they may, if they so desire, yield to the man with whom they have contracted a doubtful point, or even a contested point that is not doubtful, because when they yield they will be relinquishing their own property; but you can not be so generous with the money or the goods you hold in trust for another. We are but trustees of the national property in the canal, and if we yield it we yield not that which is ours to give but that which belongs to our principals, who never instructed us to yield it, but who by their votes instructed us the other way.

I am sometimes a little inclined to be amused, sometimes to be irritated, at the argument put forward that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has written to all the delegates to the Baltimore convention and that he has received replies from most of them that they are perfectly willing to back up on that platform. That does not meet the point. The delegates to the Baltimore convention have no more right to rescind that platform than a man has a right to rescind his proposition after the other man has acted upon the faith of the proposition. The Baltimore convention, if it had made a mistake, might have the day after it adjourned been reassembled and might have rescinded its platform. Possibly if a mistake is made by a convention the delegates may after adjournment by a unanimous vote rectify the error, but when? Surely before the people of the United States have accepted the contract and upon its faith cast their ballots and elected men to office; and then, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], with his usual clearness of expression, says, the people who voted would have to be consulted.

Mr. President, when I arose, I intended only to discuss the propriety of the point of order being urged. I have been led by interruptions and questions far afield. Since I have gone thus far, I shall briefly advert to one other question. I refer to the contention that we should determine what the treaty means, not by its language but by ascertaining what the negotiators thought it meant, or said it meant.

Who made this treaty? Was it a treaty when the representatives of England met the representatives of the United States, and when they reduced a proposition to writing? Why, at that period, sirs, it had no more force, validity, or life than the blank parchment had before ink had been touched to it. They were preparing a proposition, to be submitted to whom? To the high contracting parties.

Who were the high contracting parties? Were they Mr. Choate and Lord Lansdowne? Why, those gentlemen had no more power to make a contract binding upon either country than any single Senator in this body, and any single member of the House of Parliament had power to meet and make a treaty. They were not the contracting parties at all; and consequently that which they did and that which they wrote does not enter into the opinion, the conclusion, or the act of the contracting parties.

Who were the contracting parties? They were the Government of Great Britain and the President of the United States, and still there was no contract until the Senate of the United States made the contract valid.

I will admit that if, between the Senate of the United States and the President upon the one hand and the English Government upon the other, communications had passed back and forth, those communications between the contracting parties might be considered for the purpose of throwing light upon dark passages and obscure sentences in the treaty; but I utterly deny that the inner consciousness of a mere negotiator can bind either the Government of England or the Government of the United States; and there is plenty of reason for that.

What did we know about the private talks held between the negotiators? What we had before us was the written document. Upon the written document, and not upon the private talks, we acted and we made amendments. If we are ever to admit the heresy that the private understanding of the negotiators is to be binding upon the Senate, then before we ever ratify another treaty we must first have all the correspondence passing between the negotiators, and, second, we must take evidence and find out what each negotiator said to the other; and then, instead of adopting a treaty as the conclusion and finality, and as the thing agreed upon, we will just adopt all the evidence and all the correspondence, and call that a treaty.

It is a dangerous doctrine. It is a vicious doctrine. It leaves us in a position, if it becomes the policy of the Senate, where when we examine a treaty in the future we will have no knowledge as to whether the treaty means what its language imports or whether that language is to be distorted and twisted and changed by virtue of a private talk between two negotiators.

Mr. President, I believe this is an American canal, built by American money, for the benefit of the American people. I believe that we have contracted that we will treat alike the vessels of all nations "observing these rules"; and if that provision were not in the treaty I would insist that we should do so. But I believe that the United States is not included in the term "all nations observing these rules." We are the sovereign, the proprietor. I might be prepared even to waive all questions of internal economics and vote for the repeal out of consideration for the views of others if I could do so without yielding for all time, under the conditions now existing, the right of the American people to dominate the canal.

But we do not stand here to vote upon this naked bill. We must take the bill with its history. Its genesis was a protest from England, mildly made and subsequently practically withdrawn. The second step was a speech by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], circulated in an amount, I think, of 1,750,000 copies by an organization existing in the city of Washington which, in my opinion, comes so nearly being international that it can not be described as national. The third step was the assembling of Congress to hear the President declare that great message. The fourth step is the enactment of this bill, in response to the demand of Great Britain and the President. We must vote for it in the face of repeated declarations by Senators upon this floor that they have arrived at the conclusion since they voted the last time that after all the United States has no rights in the canal, except the right to pay for it.

So I am unwilling that an amendment such as is offered by the Senator from North Carolina shall go through as the expression of our rights in this canal. The man who comes in and asserts, "I own this property; it is mine; nevertheless, out of consideration for your opinion, I will submit it to an impartial tribunal or I will negotiate with you further," occupies a position where every moment of the time he can defend his interest. But when a man comes in, as comes the Senator from North Carolina, and says, "I admit in advance that I believe we have no rights; therefore I offer an amendment solemnly reciting that whatever rights we do not have are hereby sacredly reserved," that kind of an amendment does not suit me, and in my opinion it does not suit the American electorate. I propose to vote against that amendment now, because I do not believe it properly declares the position of the United States, and because I do not believe it properly reserves and conserves our rights. I express regret again that a point of order is raised which denies us the right in advance to vote squarely upon the proposition advanced here that we shall assert our sovereign and complete rights in the canal.

Mr. WEEKS obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRISTOW. This morning the Chair ruled an amendment out of order on the ground that it was in the third degree. It was an effort to amend the original amendment to which the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is a substitute. I wish to inquire if the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina should be adopted will it then be open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be then subject to amendment. The Senator from Massachusetts will proceed.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who has just discussed the tolls bill at great length and with his usual skill, introduced a new feature into the debate to which I wish to give some consideration, namely, the amendment which he has introduced to repeal the laws which give a monopoly, so called, to our coastwise shipping.

The Senate should appreciate the fact that business in this country is not nearly as good as fundamental conditions seem to warrant its being, and, in my judgment, one of the principal reasons for this is the repeated attacks which are being made on its organization and methods of conduct similar to the one which has just been launched against coastwise shipping by the Senator from Missouri. New capital will not enter a field where its value may be lessened or practically destroyed by ill-considered legislative action.

I happen to have at hand an extract from the first annual message which James Buchanan made to Congress in 1857, and which, I think, is applicable to the point which I am making. President Buchanan said:

Since the adjournment of the last Congress our constituents have enjoyed an unusual degree of health. The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices, and up till within a brief period our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, not withstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interests is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth we find our manufacture suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

In giving a monopoly to our coastwise shipping during the past hundred years, as we have done, we have been following the course practiced by all other nations. This is a protection country. If the people of the United States had an opportunity to vote on the question of protection or free trade they would, in my judgment, without any doubt vote in favor of protection. We have been protecting our coastwise trade against the competition of the rest of the world, carrying out the protective policy which we have made applicable and useful in all of our industrial affairs.

To some degree this information may have been put in the RECORD, but I have before me, in the annual report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1912, a statement of the manner of protecting the coastwise traffic of every commercial country in the world. I will not take the time to read it, but I will ask to have it incorporated in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From Annual Report of Commissioner of Navigation for 1912.]

[1] Norway, according to information furnished by the Norwegian minister on Oct. 23, 1912, to the Bureau of Navigation, opens its coasting trade to foreign vessels except those of Sweden, which maintains a similar prohibition against Norwegian vessels.

Mr. WEEKS. I simply want to add that the statement shows that every country, with the exception of Great Britain, at this time makes reservations relating to its coastwise shipping, and not only does every country do it, but Great Britain even now does it in this way: It makes a different port charge to vessels flying the British flag from that made to vessels flying the flag of any other country.

Now, has it been of any benefit to this country to have protected our coastwise shipping as we have done? I think the figures will demonstrate that it has enabled us to build up a business that is of material benefit to every coastwise section of the United States.

Let us examine for one moment some of the figures relating to this trade. We had 50 years ago more than two and a half million tons of vessels engaged in our foreign trade. In 1910 we had 791,000 tons of American vessels engaged in the American trade

We had 50 years ago engaged in the coastwise trade about two and a half million tons. Last year we had 7,400,000 tons. Therefore while our vessels engaged in the foreign trade have decreased 200 per cent in tonnage our coastwise shipping has increased an equal amount, so that now it is three times what it was 50 years ago.

We have depended upon the men employed in this coastwise trade to furnish seamen for our Navy in time of need. We have depended upon the vessels employed in the coastwise trade to supplement our Navy, furnishing auxiliaries for every purpose for that service, and we have in many other ways as a Nation made use of this coastwise development. So, even from the standpoint of the Government itself, it has been of material value to us.

But, in addition to that, we employ in this country more than 250,000 men in shipbuilding. We employ on board vessels engaged in this trade tens of thousands of men at good wages under good working conditions.

My friend from Missouri has offered a proposition which would prevent any necessity for further consideration of the pending bill, because if his proposal were to prevail and we were to adopt the amendment which he has offered—to repeal the laws which protect our coastwise shipping—in one year's time, in my judgment, every dollar's worth of that shipping would be flying a foreign flag, and there would be no reason for Great Britain to object to our permitting our coastwise shipping to go through the canal without paying toll, because we would not have any. If the owner of a coastwise vessel continued to fly the American flag, he would simply be flying it in the face of Providence, because under the conditions which prevail we can not possibly compete with other nations.

A few years ago some patriotic men in this country built a couple or ships to ply between Seattle and the Orient, to see if they could develop a first-class line to engage in the foreign trade and make it profitable under our prevailing laws. Those two ships cost about $2,000,000, and six years afterwards the Government bought them, paying 36 per cent less than their original cost; that is, the owners charged off a depreciation of 6 per cent annually, while 3 per cent is an ordinary charge for such a purpose, and they had not earned a net dollar during the six years they had been in operation. So the men who put money into these ships, which were brought into direct competition with the Japanese and English ships plying between the Orient and our Pacific coast, lost practically 72 per cent on their investment in the six years in which they were in operation. That is simply an indication of what would happen if we were to adopt this amendment.

We were told yesterday by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] that the rates charged in our coastwise trade were materially higher than the rates which are charged by foreign tramp steamers, or possibly higher than the rates which are paid by foreigners for their own coastwise trade. I think probably that is true. There is no doubt, in fact, that we are paying higher rates, and yet the comparisons which the Senator submitted can not be depended on, as rates vary radically in such cases.

For instance, a tramp steamer will come into an American port bringing a cargo, and if there is a large amount of merchandise offering for shipment the rate will be materially different from what the rate will be if there is comparatively little merchandise offering for shipment. In other words, in order to get a return cargo for a tramp steamer the rate which it will charge will depend on the amount of goods offering for shipment. The rate might double in some cases over and above what it would be in other cases. Very much of the foreign shipping which is engaged in trade with our country is of the tramp variety, with no fixed schedule of rates. It goes from one port to another, dependent on the course of business. Therefore it is not possible that there can be any real comparison made in rates between the shipping engaged in our foreign trade or our coastwise shipping and that of foreign countries. To emphasize that statement I will read a letter from Prof. Huebner, of the University of Pennsylvania, with whom I consulted some time ago. Prof. Huebner was employed as the expert by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives, which, in many respects, made a very careful examination of the conditions of our shipping trade during the Sixty-second Congress. Prof. Huebner says:

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Philadelphia, May 6, 1914.

Senator JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is to acknowledge your favor of May 4, forwarded to me from Washington, and I hasten to reply. While it may be comparatively easy to obtain rates charged by carriers engaged in the coastwise trade of foreign countries, a comparison of those rates with the rates charged by carriers in the American coastwise trade would only be fair if numerous conditions were ascertained and taken into account. In other words, the object of a comparison is to ascertain whether the rates charged in any given route are "reasonable" as compared with those charged on another route, involving a study of: (1) The difference in the nature of the service rendered by the lines engaged, respectively, in the American and foreign coastwise services; (2) the initial cost of the vessel and the expensiveness of operating the same (in this respect American owners of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, I understand, are operating at a very considerable disadvantage); (3) the different conditions surrounding each trade route as regards the quality of the service, the cost of terminal facilities, the necessity or absence of lighterage service from the pier to the vessel, the quantity of cargo offered in both directions, involving possibly a very light haul in one direction, and the opportunity for affecting proper combination cargoes. All of these factors cause rates to vary in a given trade.

I would also mention all these factors as applicable to a comparison of our coastwise rates with the rates charged by carriers in the foreign trade for equal distances, although, in addition, the influence of the tramp steamer in competition with certain of the line services is also important. Judging from my experience in comparing rates charged by lines engaged in the American foreign trade, it will also be difficult to make comparisons, because the rate tariffs are in many instances not quoted on the same basis—that is, sometimes the rate will be based on weight and sometimes on measurement. This difference in the rate tariffs would necessitate translating weight figures into measurement figures.

I shall be in Washington on Friday and in case you should desire further information I shall be pleased to assist you further. I may be reached at room 279, House Office Building.

Respectfully, yours, S. S. HUEBNER.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WEEKS. I do.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator from Massachusetts will perhaps remember that in the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, last month and the month before, the evidence was very conclusive that competition between steamers plying in the coastwise trade, especially on the Pacific coast, was very severe. I think no one claims that the profits were abnormal; that no one claims that those vessels were not working on a very close basis; and I think no one made the claim that, so far as the general traffic was concerned, there was any trust or combination.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I shall try to demonstrate before I finish that the coastwise shipping of this country is not in an unusually prosperous business condition, and I will demonstrate the fact that the steamship lines, which are claimed to monopolize trade, lost money last year almost without exception, and that for a term of years their earnings have been such that all of their securities are selling below par.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Massachusetts mentioned a few moments ago that he had a statement giving a synopsis of the laws of other countries in regard to their several regulations of the coastwise traffic.

Mr. WEEKS. I did; and I put it into the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. My attention was diverted, and I did not know that the Senator had asked permission to put it into the RECORD.

Mr. WEEKS. I have put it into the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the Senator object to stating, if it will not divert him from the line of his thought, the substance, in a general way, as to what the statement shows?

Mr. WEEKS. It shows that substantially every commercial country in the world reserves the right to its own shipping to conduct its coastwise trade. There are exceptions based on reciprocal arrangements which may be made. In the case of Great Britain the only difference is one of port charges; but, generally speaking, not only the home coastwise trade, but, as in the case of Russia, for example, the trade with its far eastern possessions is reserved to Russian ships.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, a gentleman appeared before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and made a suggestion which I wish to submit to the Senator from Massachusetts and to have his opinion upon. He said that for the canal to be of the greatest benefit to the American people foreign ships should be permitted to engage in our coastwise commerce, but should be taxed and licensed; that that license should be per ton on the cargo handled; and that it should amount to the difference in the cost of construction and operation of the American ships and the foreign ships. His argument was that we did not have at present the American-built ships; that the political uncertainty as to tolls, and so forth, would prevent capital from investing in such ships, and that if some such arrangement as that were made there would be ample protection to the American ships, and it would still give the American business man an opportunity to ship by water and have ships to carry his commerce. That gentleman was a man of experience and was much opposed to the general proposition of admitting foreign ships to compete with our coastwise vessels.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, if I thought there were a monopoly which is burdensome to the shippers of the United States connected with the coastwise marine, I think I might be in favor of some such suggestion as that; but I do not think the monopoly exists; in fact, I am so confident that it does not exist that it seems ridiculous to me to suggest that it does. Anybody who can buy a vessel can go into this trade anywhere he desires. There is no shortage of wharfage in any seaport in the United States, and there is no possibility that a man can not get a vessel by purchase or construction for that purpose. While we make a national monopoly of the trade, it is absolutely open and competitive to the individual.

The reason that there is no more competition in line service in many places is because line service under present conditions is not profitable. If it were profitable, you may be quite sure that there would be ample capital available to go into that business in competition with the existing service.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. Now, let me answer a little further the suggestion which the Senator has made, that our people will not go into this service on account of uncertainties. It is true that there are uncertainties in connection with this Panama trade, largely developed by this legislation, and yet the American-Hawaiian Steamship Co. has 26 excellent ships, as the Senator from Kansas knows, which are engaged in trade in connection with the Tehuantepec Railroad. They will probably go through the canal if tolls are not charged, and will quite likely add to their present service, carrying the products of Hawaii to New York and returning cargoes to ports on the Pacific coast. The Luckenbach Steamship Co. has 10 steamships already in operation from Atlantic ports by the Straits of Magellan to the Pacific ports, and from the Pacific coast ports to Panama. If they have been able to conduct that trade under the conditions necessary in going through the straits, naturally they will continue it and extend it if they are able to use the canal.

W. R. Grace & Co. have four ships already in the same service, and the same statement will apply to them. The John S. Emery Co., of Boston, have two ships building, and more are to be chartered, to run from Boston through the canal to San Francisco and Puget Sound points. The Red Star Line now has two ships in the trans-Atlantic service in the United States to be transferred to this service, and it has plans for others; so that our shipping interests are preparing for this trade, and will, so far as possible, I assume, take advantage of the benefits of the canal.

But the Senator will notice that that is not confined to any one class of shippers or to any one class of citizens. Those ships can not be owned by trusts under our laws or by railroads; they must be independent concerns; and yet I have given the names of five concerns that undoubtedly will in a large way make use of the canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want, with the Senator's permission, to suggest, as great stress has been laid upon the allegation that the American coastwise trade was controlled by a monopoly, that that argument could possibly have no bearing upon the question that is before the Senate, because the law which is under discussion, a clause of which it is sought to repeal, distinctly provides that such ships shall not use the canal; and, if they are permitted to use the canal, it would be because of dereliction on the part of the administrative officers of the United States.
